The Design Argument.

We have received from Mr. B. R. Anderson, of Concordia, Kan., a request for further elucidation of the problem of design in nature. His letter we could not find room for here, but as the charming picture which it contains of a Freethinker's happy fireside, to say nothing of its other features, forbade its exclusion altogether, we have inserted it in another part of this issue.

Many readers will remark the difference between the tone in which this Freethinker engages argument, and that which marks the Christian. "Please think carefully," he says, "on my mental difficulty here and help me out of it, my brother, if you see the way out yourself." This is the true style of address from one rational being to another when he meets a difference in opinion. That day will be pleasant when Liberals shall everywhere have supplanted by this fashion of speech the angry attack of the Christian upon every dissentient. Enjoyable will be the age when this method of settling variances of opinion shall have taken the place of St. Bartholomew's eves and Homesteads. We will indeed, Mr. Anderson, give you our best aid; depending that if we fall into any of ratiocination's all too numerous pitfalls you in turn will "help us out of it, brother, if you see the way out yourself."

It is our opinion that the error of the person who thinks he perceives design in nature lies in his viewing each phenomenon as isolated, independent. He is not sufficiently aware of the many relations which connect that phenomenon with the past. He takes that old view of nature which we call the statical, which regards nature as a fixed state, instead of the modern and correct view called the dynamical, which regards nature as a process. He usually is, it is true, more or less conscious that each phenomenon is the outcome of a long train of causes and modifications, but he is only faintly conscious of it. That train of causes and modifications does not make a sufficient figure in his mind. His taking this view is because of his rearing under the old systems of thought which regard the universe as having been created as it now is. He will leave this view and grow into the correct one as his environments become gradually permeated by the new-found doctrine of evolution, under which we contemplate each phenomenon in its relations to an immense past.

It may be noticed that the design advocate finds adaptation in those parts of the universe which are mobil, flowing, moldable, instead of in those which are immobil, stationary, unmoldable. He cites as instances the physique of the animal, which is exceedingly mobil, flowing, and moldable; the structure of the plant, of which the same may be said, and the heavenly bodies, which indeed are never out of motion and change. On the other hand, he does not cite such parts of the universe as the rock-masses of the earth, or the under-layers of the soil, which are comparatively fixed and changeless. Now, the reason of this is that the moving and moldable bodies, first named, have from their motion and moldableness in time become shaped to whatever courses they have been passing through, and in addition have shaped their courses to their own selves; and the results are what the design advocate calls adaptation. While the stationary bodies, last named, have had very slight chance to shape themselves to the rest of the universe or to shape that to themselves.

It is clear that if any single phenomenon of a class that is mobil or moldable be viewed by itself alone, without knowledge of how its class has previously shaped its course and been shaped by it, the marks of that shaping, or adaptation, will excite wonder. But if it be viewed as the terminative link of a long chain of phenomena, each of which acted on, and was acted on by, its environment, the ground for surprise disappears.

To make this clear, examples will be needed. A river belongs to the mobil and moldable class. Its course presents infinite instances of adaptation. It is adapted to its bed, as it perfectly fits and fills it. That bed, on the other hand, is adapted to the river. It has been worn into suitability for the river's requirements at countless points. Inequalities both at the bottom and at the sides have been removed. Many streams feed the river, each of them presenting a like adaptation. The river holds a course to the sea direct or nearly direct. Now, if we view any one section, any one cubic foot, of water in the river by itself, disregarding the prior operation of its predecessors, we shall see what seem peculiar marks of design for its conduit. Likewise if we view any one section of the line of vegetable or animal life by itself, disregarding its predecessors, we shall see what seem peculiar marks of design for its preservation. But we, as matter of fact, are aware of the predecessors of the section of water and so do not make the error; and mankind will soon become aware of the predecessors of present plants and animals, and their operation in making the present ones what they are, and not make the error there. Electricity may be chosen for another example. The electricity in any given inch of wire finds that inch suitable for its passage because the electricity in preceding inches found those inches suitable for its passage. This case is somewhat different from that of the river, being one merely of selection of a possible course, without any operation upon a course to produce fitness. In the case of magnetism we find the initial passages of that force adapting the course to succeeding passages in a way peculiar to itself; all have noticed that a piece of steel once brought in contact with a magnet becomes a magnet itself. Further examples may be found at will among the other mobil and circulating species of existence.

It will be found that the chief property which we said a class of natural substance must possess in order greatly to affect its environment and be affected by it—viz., mobility—is present in a high degree in the plant and animal kingdoms. These kingdoms present both molecular motion—or that of the molecules or atoms of which a mass is constituted—and molar motion—or that of the mass itself. The atoms of the plant and the animal, we know, are in a state of incessant change; and both plant and animal move their various members or limbs. And the animal has the power, unpossessed by the plant, of transportation of its total frame from one part of the globe to another. This last species of mobility, the function of locomotion, gives its possessor the signal power of selection of its environment. As the drops of water throughout a wide region are by their mobility enabled to collect in a river, the animals throughout a region are by their mobility, or locomotion, enabled to collect in whatever part they find most favorable. The plant, to be sure, may be said to possess nearly as great a mobility in this point. For it possesses what is nearly as serviceable as locomotion—the faculty of sending its seeds afar off and thus reaching other places in its descendants if not in itself. It produces many seeds, which are conveyed everywhere by winds and bees and birds, and while those which reach unfitting soils fail those which find fitting ground flourish. And this point of reproduction now brings us to one of the most important features of the matter. For it is by means of this function of the plant and animal lines, of discontinuing in normal form at short intervals and reappearing in fresh individualities, that those lines have acquired their unusual number of adaptations, their manifold faculties, and that the latter has reached its climax of all-subduing man. For at each of these quasi discontinuances of the plant or animal line, that line reappears not merely in a single form to counterbalance the loss of the normal or adult form, but in a number of forms, and as these are all different and all cannot find room for survival it follows that the one which will survive will be the one most adapted to its environment. Hence at each generation every species becomes more highly and complicatedly fitted to its environment, until in the course of ages the fittiness has attained that degree which draws the attention of the advocate of design. This is not all. To this means of improvement, known as natural selection, or the survival of the fittest, there is added another, the name of which is sexual selection. The females of each species have varying tastes; those which chance to select males endowed with qualities advantageous in the struggle for existence breed young which are more likely to live than the young of females who have chosen poorly endowed males; and as like begets like the female young of the first-named inherit the same taste, and choice of the well-endowed males is again made, and so on until it becomes firmly fixed by heredity. In the human species, the choice by females of lusty and prowessful males is an example; the occasional choice by a woman of a weakling is an exception, induced partly by the operation of the emotion of pity with which maternity fills the feminine sex, and partly by the harmful over-compassion for the incompetent instilled by the unnatural teachings of Christ. The female choice in the human species, however, has become a case of social taste perpetuated by custom rather than of instinct fixed by heredity. It is proper to mention that female choice in the lower animals has been denied altogether by some investigators. A second variety of sexual selection, choice by males of healthy and vigorous females, as for instance of a thriving cow by a bull in preference to an ailing one, has been suggested, but not sufficiently grounded on observation. That is, its existence in the lower animals has not been sufficiently grounded on observation; its presence in the human species is obvious—what are called beauties in the female are in a large portion of cases merely marks of health and vigor. Finally, there is a third form of sexual selection that is admitted by all—battle by males for the possession of females, in which the abler wins, and perpetuates his gifts in his offspring. To these two agencies of rapid improvement, natural selection and sexual selection, a third is to be added. This is development by use. When any organ is put to unusual exertion it draws from the rest of the system an unusual supply of nutrition, and increases in size. Familiar examples are the arm of the blacksmith, and the chest of the athlete in general. Hence when any organism has been thrown into an environment where it has had need to exercise a certain part unusually, that part has tended to grow till equal to the need for it. This latter agency is supposed to have been of inconsiderable effect in bringing about the present development of plant and animal life, when compared with the two first mentioned.

It is in the point of the peculiar continuance of the life-line of plants and animals by death of individuals and substitution of their progeny, that we have the greatest need of applying the caution given at the beginning of this article, to consider any link of a chain of phenomena not as though it were isolated and independent but as a part of a whole—a long-modified product of a past. The design advocate makes the error of paying attention only to the fact that each individual of a species is provided at its birth with the organs fit for its survival, without noticing that it is but a part of its parent who beforetime possessed those organs, and he in turn a part of his parent who possessed them also, and so on. The particles of our body are continually being worn out and renewed, we know, the old saying being that we have a complete new body every seven years. Now, as we do not wonder at the new particles thus betaking themselves in an adult form to the several organs of that form, as eye or ear or foot, so we need not wonder at such particles betaking themselves in the womb of that adult to the several organs of the young therein, as eye or ear or foot. Each is but a case of self-propagation, self-extension, self-maintenance, or like reproducing like. If this very self-propagation in itself seem mysterious, it should be recollected that it is but a case of a common law of which other examples abound. One bad apple rots the whole basket, one bit of yeast leavens the batch of dough, one magnet makes thousands. The tendency is no more wonderful than any other in nature. Suppose the case were the opposite, self annihilation instead of self-reproduction, the Theist, if he existed, would wonder just the same. Of course, if one is determined to wonder, and assign supernatural causes, he can not be prevented from it while there exists something for him to do so upon. The phenomenon of reproduction, we will here interject, loses its seeming of marvelousness when studied in the lower forms of life, where it is accomplished by processes much more simple than those seen in our species; and it is desirable that all inform themselves on these lower forms of reproduction. Adding that there is no better book for that purpose than Spencer's "Biology," we will go on with our main line of argument. Trendelburg and others insist on the fact that the eye is not formed in light, or after the young creature has been born and found the need of sight, but before it was born, in the darkness of the womb, for light; and this they say proves an aim of a superior Intelligence that the creature shall be equipped with sight. Here we must look at the fetus in the womb, according to our caution, not as a totally distinct and new-projected organism, but as a part of the parents, a continuation of the total life-line of the species. We are not to wonder at material for eyes being supplied on the inside of an animal any more than at its being supplied on the outside. One is just as wonderful as the other, and just as unwonderful and natural as the other. We meet a man whom we have not seen for a week and do not marvel at his organs having during that time been nourished and preserved by vital force; then if we meet not him but a part of him that has been separated into what we call an infant, we need not marvel at that part of him having had its organs nourished and preserved by vital force. As in the case of the river any one section or foot of its course could not by itself have effected the excellent provision for it which its bed constitutes, but this is the work of countless antecedents, so any one section of animal life could not by itself have effected the excellent provision for itself which its eye, etc., constitute, but this is the work of countless antecedents. By the way, as the construction of the eye raises more wonder in the design-believers than that of any other organ, they are recommended to study up in evolutionary biology the development of that organ from the simplest and rudest beginnings in the jelly-fish and such low forms of life. So much in the way of caution against taking too isolated a view in the matter of a young creature's possessing organs already provided for his needs; now let us turn to something which equally puzzles many—the fact that each individual is born in a suitable environment, and thus placed, even before he has shown what he demands for his existence, in conditions capable of supplying his demands. Here we as above recur to the fact that he is not an independent creation, preceded by phenomena perhaps so opposite in nature that their conditions would be just the contrary of those required by him, but he is a continuation of a living line which must have existed up to his birth in conditions capable of it, and hence he is born in conditions capable of him. The electricity in any given inch of wire finds, as we said before, that inch capable of it because the electricity in preceding inches found those inches capable of it, and so a fish finds the sea, or a bird the air, or a land animal the land, capable of it because its antecedents found this sea, or air, or land, capable of them. Of course, the electricity sooner or later finds the end of the wire and disappears; and so does each species of animals sooner or later find the end of the line of environment capable of it, and disappear—our earth abounds with fossils of species which have thus disappeared.

It is by the natural agencies which we have roughly outlined above—with possibly the aid of one or two more, equally natural—it is by these, we say, superposed upon other and simpler workings of the elementary forces of heat, light, motion, etc., that the present adaptation of vegetable and animal life to their surroundings has in every instance been produced. There are many volumes that set the matter forth in convincing detail, which may be procured by whomsoever wishes.

Our correspondent mentions the fact that the pollen, or male seed, of many species of plants is found on one individual plant, and the female seed ready for it on another. If this arrangement be viewed in the way which we admonished against, as unprecedented by an infinite number of varying arrangements one of which finally succeeded in propagating the plant, of course it will surprise. But if the history of plant-life be studied, if the past be taken fully into the mental view, the need for wonder will vanish. Some plants, our correspondent adds, admit to their flowers insects which by unconsciously bearing away their seed favor their fertilization, and exclude injurious ones. However, the plant does not know that any insect will be helpful or that any will be injurious to it. Neither does any extra-natural being know it and cause the plant to act thus. But among the countless individuals of those species some chanced to have flowers with shapes that were more convenient to useful insects than to harmful, and that expanded when pressed in those parts where certain useful insects trod and contracted when pressed in those parts where certain harmful insects of other shapes trod; and these plants thus succeeded in propagating their like, and the others perished. As for the bird's quill, the process of explanation of this, or any other phenomenon cited by design champions, lies on the same lines, and we leave it to be constructed by anyone. Finally, our friend speaks of the laws of the planets' orbital motion. These laws we will deal with in our next issue. They are not half so beautiful as our friend fondly opines. They are about like the laws of the state of New York. We will besides handle in our next issue or issues such other points of our Theistic friend's letter as most require canvassing.

The main points of this foregoing article of ours may be compressed into one sentence, thus: Every moving species of existence becomes shaped to its course and often shapes its course to itself; plant and animal life are moving species of existence and have become shaped to their courses and shaped their courses to themselves; and three of the most striking processes by which they have done so are natural selection, sexual selection, and development by use.

To facilitate comprehension we are in this reply using the words "fitted to" and "adapted to" in senses where simply "capable of" would be more exact. We have also spoken of some adaptations as "complex" when they are not, from a strict point of view, more complex than anything else. But changes must be made one at a time. We do not expect men to alter at once the whole of their customary terminology as well as systems of thought. Rebuilding a brain is no work of an hour or a month. We have, too, omitted some particulars which would make too cumbersome and repellent certain conceptions. As an instance, our oft-used formula of "mobility, flow, moldableness," may well take remodeling, both by the addition of the quality of a certain amount of stability, and in other ways. We write for immediate apprehension; once interested, our readers will peruse works on the subjects and reach sufficient completeness.

The Fair.

The Freethought Federation is doing strenuous work for personal liberty and against Puritanism in the matter of the World's Fair. The secretary, who is traveling through the Western part of the country, is distributing leaflets and other literature upon the question of Sunday opening. He recently visited Minneapolis, as the guest of Mr. Charles Lownd, and the Tribune of that city prints this sketch of his purpose: "I have been sent out by the American Freethought Federation. Our organization has taken a special interest in the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. Of course our efforts are directed toward Congress. That is the body that is responsible for the Sunday-closing act and the only one that can repeal it. Our president, S. P. Putnam, who, by the way, recently lectured in Minneapolis, is now in Washington, and when the repealing bill comes before its committee will appear and make an argument in favor of Sunday opening. All the petitions were from the religious element," said he, "and Congress very naturally thought their petitions represented the sentiment of the people. The fact is that some of these petitions were a fraud perpetrated upon Congress. The petition presented from the state of Michigan has been examined and it is found to contain 1,500,000 more signers than the entire population of the state—male, female, adult and infant—according to the census of 1890. So with Ohio. The petition presented from that state had upon it 500,000 more names than the entire population of the state. We propose to present these facts to Congress and to accompany them with a monster petition, signed only by voters, which shall show the real sentiment of the people. The Freethought Federation will secure a petition with 1,000,000 signers. The Chicago papers have scattered petitions all over the country, and all the labor organizations and the Adventist church are actively engaged in the cause of the opening. We will accept no compromise. We either want Sunday opening or Sunday closing. The religious element apparently believe that the Fair will be opened and are suggesting a compromise by which the mechanical and machinery departments would be closed and the art gallery opened. This art gallery concession they make in the interests of the poor workingman. The fact is the workingman would only appreciate the departments which the religious element demand be closed; the art gallery would have little interest for him. Another thing they ask for is religious services if the Fair shall be opened. Personally I would not oppose this because it would place faith and science on trial and show which of the two has the greater attractiv power to interest the masses."

Mr. Putnam, the president, is in Washington, working incessantly, getting hold of Congressmen and impressing upon them the views of Freethinkers and the necessity of Congress to hearken unto them. Mr. Putnam is working for resolution No. 177, printed in his Notes. The other two resolutions are simply intended to let the gates be opened that the admission fee can be collected. They are compromises—letting the principle involved go in order to get in a dollar. Liberals want none of them. The prospects are that the matter will be decided during the month, and then Mr. Putnam will resume his lecturing work.

Our readers can very materially assist Mr. Putnam in his work by writing at once to A. C. Durborow, chairman of Exposition committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., urging, 1. That House resolution No. 177 be adopted; 2. That Mr. Samuel P. Putnam be given a hearing before the committee to voice the sentiment of the Freethinkers of the country. Letters upon these points should be written at once, as the time for reporting the resolutions is near. We earnestly urge every one of our readers to do this, to aid their leaders in this fight which is being waged for them. Let our lawmakers know that there are some people left who adhere to the principles of our government and desire their perpetuation. The Christians are exerting themselves to the utmost to complete the union of church and state, and aside from the temporary aid of financiering Chicagoans Liberals are the only ones to oppose them. It is time for work—hard work, persistent work!

Generous Friends.

We have received during the past week some aid in the shape of donations, for which we return hearty thanks, and which we shall use in distributing Freethought literature.

Mr. J. G. Shuman, in remitting for THE TRUTH SEEKER, adds: "I inclose five dollars to agitate and aid the cause of Freethought and religious liberty." Our good old friend, R. Butterfield, sends for some books, and contributes a balance of $1.55 to printing and distributing the World's Fair leaflets. Mr. A. S. Allison makes the Editor a present of a dollar balance, which goes the same way, and Mr. Joseph E. Alexander asks us to use four dollars as we think best for the cause of Freethought. Ernest Platz makes THE TRUTH SEEKER a present of five dollars, and Mrs. Mabel Tarbell sends us two dollars, along with five for the Freethought Federation. Mrs. Tarbell says, what her gift implies, that she is pleased with the paper. J. W. Gilbert donates the change from a V after a year's subscription is paid, and Charles Laperche puts in an extra dollar when renewing.

The generosity of these friends is fully appreciated. It makes our task lighter, besides spreading a good deal of Liberal literature over the country. We have a great many Freethought pamphlets and TRUTH SEEKERS on hand, and it is a source of great satisfaction to scatter them broadcast, which we do to the extent of our means.

The New York Sun sapiently remarks: "The project of a congress of religions at the Chicago Fair is attractiv, but in view of the well-known effects of theological and religious discussion upon the bile, a congress to preserve the peace in the congress of religions might be necessary."

In front of a Japanese store in Twenty-third street, New York city, a little sandpot stuck full of tapers, or incense sticks, is displayed with a sign bearing these words: "Incense—good for grip." This begets a theory closely uniting disease-germs with evil spirits, because in China those same little sticks of punk, seasoned with ground sandalwood, are said to keep evil spirits out of the room. You light a few and keep them by your bedroom door with full confidence that no demons can disturb you or steal your soul overnight. Christians are excited to no inconsiderable amount of grinning by these mystic paraphernalia. But they are not a bit more ridiculous than the grinner's own charms and talismans of holy water and scapulars and relics and eucharistic bread.

When Mr. Samuel P. Putnam finishes his labors with the Congressmen at Washington he desires to make a lecturing trip through the states of Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Florida. Liberals residing in that section of the country are requested to write him at once at 1,325 G street N.W., Washington, D. C. While in Washington he will make trips to near-by places if desired, and Liberals in the East should not neglect the opportunity.

The St. Joseph, Missouri, News gives an account of a "terrific combat" which recently took place in a Methodist church in that city during an evening meeting. Deacon Jones, a professor in the high school, struck Brother Dr. Crossland a blow during the engagement which dislocated his left shoulder and rendered him hors du combat. No lives were lost, but many black eyes and bloody noses were carried away as souvenirs of the battle. All of which goes to show how dearly the brethren love one another.

Everybody who read THE TRUTH SEEKER a few short years ago will be glad to know that George E. Macdonald, a distant brother of the Editor, who wore a gold-mounted Badge Pin, will again contribute to these columns. He has had a varied experience in the wild and woolly West, and inhabitants of that neck-o'-woods will know their country better when he relates it. He is now editor of the Snohomish Eye, but has promised to find among the multiplicity of the duties of a country editor time to greet his old friends once more and frequently.

Touching the parliament of religions to be held at the World's Fair, the Catholic Review says: "We can hardly be expected to take part in any parliament of religions that would put on the same level Christianity and Buddhism, Mohammedanism and Mormonism." In this sentiment, that these religions should not be put on the same level, we quite concur. Christianity should not be put on the same level with other faiths. It would be a derogation to the other faiths. Christianity is considerably more vile. It has shed more blood, smothered more civilizations, set at variance more countries, disrupted more nations, more bolstered kingcraft, more persecuted investigators, and more repressed education. We owe scant consideration to other religions, still let us keep our disesteem shown them within bounds at least decent—let not Christianity be ranged by their side.

The pope writes of the Catholic educational exhibit at the World's Fair that "this undertaking will tend to show that the Catholic church does not countenance any lack of education or culture, nor a condition of ignorance." The fact is that a truthful presentation of the Catholic record would show an antagonism to education, and a fosterment of ignorance, which has been extreme just in proportion as the surrounding civilization has allowed it to be. It would show that before modernism insisted on universal education the Catholic church taught very few youth, and taught those few worthless things, and did this only to procure clergy and supporters for its own self, while it not only allowed but compelled the masses outside to remain in midnight ignorance. Such a presentation would show that in each nation of Europe and South and North America the masses remained totally uninstructed while under Catholic dominion, and have begun to gain learning only within a few late years since that rule has been abated. Finally, a truthful presentation would show that the present Catholic schools—established, as we said, only because indispensably demanded by the modern spirit—are incomparably inferior to non-Catholic ones.

One Thing and Another.

The price of W. F. Jamieson's pamphlet, "Is Controversy Dangerous?" has been reduced to 25 cents. The tract, "The Bible in Favor of Debate," is also 25 cents. We have them for sale. An Eastern paper says: "Mr. Jamieson believes if the Christian will but agree to argue with the non-Christian that half the victory for the latter is won. So he has written this pamphlet, and asks Liberals to help him publish and circulate it." This is from H. D. Ballard, of Iowa, to Mr. Jamieson: "Your pamphlet, 'Is Controversy Dangerous?' is one of the best publications I ever met with to set the reader to thinking and asserting his mental manhood. It comes home with logic to answer any criticisms offered by an orthodox slave. I have handed them all out and know they have sown seed that will bear fruit. The parties in whose hands I placed them have kept them going in many instances, to my personal knowledge, where they have made the readers bold enough to express an opinion upon the social intolerance of the orthodox churches for those who differ with their inconsistencies."

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. In December or January we shall send them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

We shall shortly publish the fourth edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." If our readers see any records of the clergy being guilty of ministerial conduct, from lying to murder, they will add to the world's knowledge and the cause of truth by marking the report and forwarding the paper containing it to this office. We desire to do all the justice possible to the reverend clergy who so kindly constitute themselves our moral and religious guardians.

Science and Progress.

Trophies of Faith.

The managers of the Miracle-church at Canton, Minn., recently exhibited a wheelbarrow load of crutches, left behind by cripples cured by the "apparition of the Holy Virgin." If the accounts of the local press can be credited it would take a large-sized express-wagon to transport the boodle left behind by idiots.

Modified Gratitude.

Revivalist Moody thinks that the passengers of the Spree ought to join the church in token of their miraculous preservation, i.e. for having encountered a southwester that tossed them, splashed them, sickened them, but like other storms finally exhausted its fury and permitted them to reach a haven of refuge. The only parallel is the story of the Berlin sportsman who met a friend on the porch of a village hotel and pointed out a farmer on the other side of the street: "See that fellow? He will never forget me as long as he lives. He owes me the preservation of his life." An hour later that friend met the same granger in a livery-stable and mentioned the remark of the Berlin visitor: "He? The fact is he mistook me for a deer and pumped me full of lead," said the farmer, "but most of the shot got stuck in my hunting-pouch, and that's what he calls saving my life."

A Business Oversight.

The police of Naples, Italy, have discovered a man who makes a business of smoke-curing manuscripts and paintings, and thus giving them an appearance of venerable antiquity. The manufacturer of the Syrian gospels ought to have secured the services of that specialist, before announcing his treasure-trove.

Bottled Spirits.

The Street-car Saint pleads guilty to the strictly private enjoyment of medicated bitters. He also admits an occurrence of that sort on the day when the plaintiff in a pending damage suit pretends to have brought him home drunk, but denies the charge of disorderly conduct. "If thou longest for communion with the spirit, enter thy cupboard-room and close the door behind thee," would make a fine temperance motto for the Mail and Express.

Lupus in Fabula.

The Hebrew firm Lowe has been acquitted of the charge insinuating the manufacture of worthless muskets, but the Jew-baiters are now trying to impeach the defendants for their relationship to one Isadore Lowe, who, years ago, offered to sell the French government a set of machines used in the process of rifling small arms. They might as well have added that a Spanish Jew of the fourteenth century sold the Moors a job-lot of arrow-flints. The trade secret of the Jew-hunt was divulged by a Moscow official who admitted that the Hebrew citizens of the Russian empire have abstained from political intrigues more strictly than any other subjects of the czar. "They avoid litigation, too," said he, "and pay their taxes as long as they are anyways able, but they have to go all the same. Our mujiks get drunk twice a week. Those circumcised sharpers keep sober and as a natural consequence the circulating medium gravitates to their pockets, till in the course of time there would not be a copper copek left for a true believer."

Human Cattle-markets.

Africa is not the only continent where the slave-traffic defies exorcism. In southern China coolies are bought at prices varying from ten to twenty-five dollars and sold to the highest bidders of the Malay peninsula—often to planters living within a day's voyage of Singapore. Peru, too, imports hundreds of such "immigrants," and not more than a year ago a steamer was wrecked on the coast of southern California on her return from a "black-birding cruise" in the Southern archipelago. Three hundred slaves, destined for the West Mexican seaport towns, are said to have got drowned on that occasion, but the contractors had no difficulty in supplying their places. The Brazilian republic has not yet revoked the law obliging freedmen to hire themselves out within a month after quitting their former employer. The commissioner of public works is authorized to gather in idle darkies by a sort of press-gang process, and of course, manages to dispense with voluntary laborers altogether. The Russian serfs have changed only their taskmasters, and the ukase of emancipation merely transferred them from the often lenient bondage of a feudal landlord to the control of a hungry government official. The Dark Continent, however, still holds its own as leading slave-market. Emin Pasha estimates the number of negroes exported from the equatorial regions at 130,000 a year. One-third of that number go northeast to Zanzibar and the borders of the Soudan; the rest north to Tunis, Fezzan, and Morocco. The farms of the Morocco tableland are worked almost exclusively by slave-labor, and the sheiks of the highland tribes rarely visit the capital without propitiating the favor of the sultan with a present of prize niggers.

A Risky Reform.

There is a story of a Chinese philanthropist who tried to organize a society for the suppression of opium-smoking among the Tae-ping rebels, but who renounced his project when he learned that the collection of the prescribed fines would require an army of 500,000 regulars. The attempt to enforce the proposed Texas temperance laws might get wrecked against a similar difficulty.

Fuel Prospects.

A few years ago the Pennsylvania coal-barons spread a report that our stores of underground fuel would give out, like natural gas, before the end of the twentieth century. The British geologist Wilson now computes the North England coal-beds to be good for hundreds of years, and those of North America for thousands, though he thinks it possible that after thirty centuries of continual output the American surface mines of bituminous coal will begin to get rather scarce. The substitution of electricity for steam and hades for hell may have helped to modify former estimates.

San Domingo.

A New York dispatch states that a syndicate of New England capitalists has secured the privilege of collecting the revenue of the island of San Domingo. The farming out of public taxes was a frequent expedient of medieval monarchs and in France was practiced up to the very eve of the French Revolution, but in the present case it might prove rather difficult to hold the government to the terms of the contract. The Domingans themselves seem indifferent to the prospect of changing masters, as long as they can keep out of the clutches of Spain. The natives of the West Indies have not yet forgotten the fact that the rule of the most Christian king involved the yearly massacre of twenty-five thousand human beings.

Christmas in Spanish America.

Christmas trees are unknown in Mexico outside of the foreigner colonies, but in many of the larger cities the churches celebrate a festival known as Pastores (shepherds) and representing the Galilean herdsmen receiving the angelic messengers and listening with open-mouthed wonder to the "tidings of great joy." Before the collection of his holiday boodle the priest orders a thanksgiving hymn and enumerates the blessings of Christian civilization, forgetting to mention such trifles as the Holy Inquisition and the thousand years' reign of despotism and ignorance. In Peru Christmas (the midsummer period of the southern hemisphere) coincides with a harvest festival, but in Buenos Ayres the 25th of December is observed only as a church holiday, and the exchange of presents is postponed to New Year's.

Model Christians.

A Boston charity association estimates the number of "vagrant, shiftless idlers"—tramps, in short—at forty thousand for New England alone. There is evidently no cause for the complaint that practical Christianity is getting a tradition of the past. In the United States and British North America there are at present at least half a million Christians who not only indorse, but practice, the instructions of their moral exemplar, taking no thought of the morrow, and preferring back-porch prayers to labor. "After all these do the gentiles seek." "Ask and it shall be given you."

F. L. OSWALD.

The Secret of Clerical Pessimism.

The world is growing better every day—
Our cares and sorrows not as they were wont to be When superstition swayed the world at will,
And priests ruled kings and law was despoty.

The world is growing better every day;
No more the heretic at stake is burned,
No longer tortures of the past are given—
The lesson of humanity is learned.

What grief and sorrow still remains
To chill the opening bud of life
Is due to superstition's iron will
That through the past brought agony and strife.

All honor, then, to those brave men
Who seek to loosen human chain;
Who make this world grow better every day,
Who superstitious errors all disdain.

Why should we mind if from the pulpit grand
The clergy tell us that the world is worse,
Since all their earnestness and grace
Mean naught but—open wide our purse?

LOUISE E. ROWLEY.

Religion in the West.

During a recent trip to British Columbia and Washington I kept on the alert for signs of progress in Liberal thought. At Winnipeg on a Sunday I found that God reigned supreme and the usual orthodox stagnation prevailed. No cars ran in the streets, and though I hired a hack, as it was engaged by the hour the driver's conscience would not allow the horses to break the Sabbath on a trot. My next stopping-place was Revelstoke, the irreligion of which may be guessed from a reference to it that I saw in the journal of a rival boom-town. A man in Revelstoke died. He was a tough character and found himself speedily consigned to hades. He had no hopes of a happy hereafter, and when he looked about the place he exclaimed with surprise, "Why, this is heaven!" "No," he was told, "this is hell." "Well," he replied, "I came from Revelstoke, and this place is so much better I thought it must be heaven."

All through the mining regions there was no church and no Sabbath. Work went on every day alike; the prospectors explored, the miners dug and blasted, and the stamp-mills rattled. I came one day to a town of five hundred people, and seeing one fine large building towering above all the rest, I thought at first, with my Quebec impressions uppermost, "There is the priest's house and the convent." I asked, "What building is that?" "The schoolhouse," was the reply. "Where is the church?" "We have none." "Oh," I exclaimed, "what a delightful place, where the best house is for the children and there is none whatever for God!" I traveled several hundred miles and never saw or heard of church or parson, until one day I saw a large log-house abandoned when about half built. "What is that?" I asked of the driver. "Oh!" said he, "a minister came along one day and coaxed some of us into building a church for him. We started it, but we got discontented about it and left off. I worked two days on the damned thing!" The tone in which this was uttered expressed, more fully than a written volume could have done, the indifference and contempt that is generally felt toward religion by the workingmen of the West.

When I came to the large towns where the comforts of life were more abundant, there I found the parson rearing his church by the help of the ladies in concerts, and begging of the large-hearted and unreligious men who believed that the "gospel sharp" was entitled to a living and were willing to chip in something for his support, though saying "We don't want none of your damned religion."

In the large cities I inquired for Secular societies or avowed Freethinkers, but never could hear of them. At Salt Lake City, however, the clerk of the hotel responded to the question by saying, "While no one makes himself prominent in declaring his opinions, it is a fact that outside of the Mormons nearly all the men are Freethinkers. In the whole circle of my acquaintance I don't know of more than one or two men who are religious." With the exception of a few keen real estate dealers, who were Methodists on Sunday, I met with no sign of religious thought among all the men that I conversed with during a tour of nearly three months. Religion is dropping away from the practical men so insensibly that its disappearance excites no thought, and they are too indifferent to care to tear away its remaining rags.

The only truly religious people that I met were the Mormons. I could discover no particular difference between them and Eastern Christians except that they were more thrifty and built better cities. After the law forbade polygamy and a few men were imprisoned, their God graciously gave a revelation forbidding polygamy, and now the chief difference is that they accept one more revelation than do the Christians. But it does not appear any more rational to despise one who believes in the revelation of Joseph Smith than one who accepts the revelation of St. John the Divine. The story is as credible that the angel Maroni showed the golden plates to Joseph as that another angel gave a little book to John to eat, which made his belly bitter; and yet the bitter belly believers persecute the golden plate saints. The appearance of the young people of the place speaks well for the system of plural marriage, which was based, professedly at least, not upon lust but upon respect for maternity and consideration for the mother. A young man, six feet in height, in whose presence some one said, "Mormonism debases the race," replied, "I am the smallest of twenty-six brothers." After seeing the works of these Mormons, I exclaimed to the caretaker of the Tabernacle, "A people who can build a city like this deserve to have their opinions respected."

One day while traveling on a mountain trail I overtook a train of pack-horses. The driver, mounted upon the hind horse, urged him along with leather thongs hanging from a broad strip of leather. When he dismounted he placed this strip over the horse's eyes as a blind to prevent his straying. What an emblem of religion is this blind, I thought. The priest uses it to scourge his victim as long as he can force him to do his will and when he has no use for him he uses it as a blind to prevent the dupe from making any researches on his own account. But the Western man, in the wild regions that are too uncomfortable for the men of God, too sparsely settled for the minions of the law, and too unceremonious for social leaders—free from the tyranny of the three big G's—God, Government, and Grundy—is brought by nearness to nature into harmony with the three great L's—Liberty, Learning, and Love, the all-sufficient saviors. The spirit of the age, the spread of knowledge, the absorbing practicality of new pursuits, are all foes of superstition, and although hierarchies appear to gain material power individuals are outgrowing their sway and ere long will dethrone them.

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

October 12th at 11 o'clock A.M. the congress was opened in the large hall of the Theater Circle of Prince Alphonso, one of the largest public buildings in Madrid, capable of seating five thousand persons. A large number of ladies in fashionable and elegant toilets adorned the two rows of loges. Among the numerous persons of eminence present one perceived Mr. Nicholas Salmeron, ex-president of the Spanish republic, and present representative of Barcelona at Cortes, surrounded by his whole family; General Riva Palacio, ambassador of the republic of Mexico, who represented at the congress the Mexican Grand Orient and French Freemasonry. The speakers' stand was decorated in all simplicity, but very tastefully. In the background, draped by a green silk curtain, was an excellent oil portrait in natural size of Victor Hugo, the work of citizen Lozano, the son of our friend Fernando Lozano. On either side of the portrait were the words "Free Thought" surrounded by draperies in Spanish, French, Italian, Belgian, American, and other national colors. Three tables covered with red velvet, one for the president, one for the orators, and a third for members of the press, completed the scenic decoration.

On this the first day the president's chair was occupied by Antonio Machado, professor at the University of Madrid, while at the same table were seated the three editors of Las Dominicales; citizen Ramon Chico, municipal councillor of Madrid; Fernando Lozano (Demofilo), and Odon de Buen, professor at the University of Barcelona. A large number of foreign delegates and members of the committee of organization surrounded the scene. Among these we may mention citizens De Tarrés-Salanat, of Barcelona; Rispa Porpina and Lucas Guera, of Maglia, and Francas Rodriguez. After an excellent opening speech by the president of the day, Antonio Machado, which will appear in a later number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the secretary of the congress, Prof. Idon de Buen, gave an account of the preparatory work of the congress, pointing out the significance and importance of the congress itself, and read a condensed account of the numerous adhesions, besides letters from several eminent Freethinkers who for various reasons were prevented from personal participation in the congress. Among the adhesions, the secretary called special attention to all the American republics and most of the European states, besides the French Freemasonry of the two worlds.

Among the societies represented by ladies we may mention the French societies Protectrice de la Femme and La Solidarité des Femmes. Speaking about the representation of Spain at the congress we must mention that it was rather mixed. Particularly noticeable was the large delegation representing the conservativ Republican party; but as an offset there appeared several delegates representing both Socialistic and Anarchistic societies, some of which belonged to the ultra-Radical groups, but as they at the congress simply represented the Freethought tendencies and only to a slight extent their peculiar social views, we can but be satisfied and rejoice in their presence.

When Prof. Odon de Buen had finished his report citizen Francas Rodriguez entertained the audience by the excellent declamation of a poem, "To the Free Conscience," the author of which is a Freethinker—Curros Enríquez. The declamation as well as the author were vigorously applauded.

Citizen Auguste Bourceret, in the name of the French Freethought Federation, greeted the generous and tolerant Spanish nation, and claimed Spain as the dignified sister of the French republic. He explained to the audience the true extent and signification of the liberties accorded the French Freethinkers by the republic, and the actual aspirations of the French Freethinkers.

Mr. Le Lubeg, vice-president of the National Secular Society of England, expressed his satisfaction and recognition of the ability of the Spanish Freethinkers, who had organized so brilliant a congress. He stated that Spain was rapidly progressing through the influence of Rationalistic organization, through the medium of work and persistency, and little by little nearing that stage of emancipation which it is the mission of Freethinkers to bring about.

The next speaker was our friend Mr. Leon Furnemont, editor of La Raison, communal councillor of Brussels, and delegate of the Freethought Federation of Belgium. He paid a tribute of satisfaction with Spain, not the tyrannical and oppressiv Spain which has burnt at the stake her best sons, but the actual Spain, the Spain of Freethought, the Spain of Salmeron, of Torilla, of Piry Margall, and of Las Dominicales. He showed how difficult was the road of Freethought. Against it were the monarchial governments, the privileged classes, and tradition. But Freethinkers do not mind them, for at last Reason and Justice are bound to reign. In conclusion Mr. Furnemont spoke against militarism, and stated that all Freethinkers ought to work for universal peace.

Citizen Thirian presented to the congress the homage of the Belgian Socialists.

Citizen A. Sluys, in the name of Holland, said that he had heard Spain, Holland, and Belgium called the three countries containing the smallest number of Freethinkers, but the assembly to-day proved the contrary. He declared furthermore that Freethinkers ought not to divide on the social question.

The word was next given to Magalhais Lima, editor of the Freethought journal O Seculo, Lisbon, Portugal, who represented the Grand Orient of Portugal. He took the stand while cries of "Liv the Portuguese republic!" sounded through the large theater. Magalhais Lima, in an elegant discourse, spoke on the modern formula of Freethought: "A free church in a free state."

Citizen S. Chaux, delegate from the Republic of Columbia, saluted the congress in the name of the Spanish-American republics. Finally, citizen Fernando Lozano (Demofilo) explained the aspirations of the Spanish Freethinkers. He paid a glowing tribute to the memory of Servetus, Giordano Bruno, and other martyrs of intolerance. He asked that foreigners give their assistance so as to help the Spanish Freethinkers in finishing the glorious work which they had undertaken.

Relativ to Portugal, he stated that the Spaniards were disposed to form a peninsular federation so as to aid one another in surmounting the difficulties and demolishing the institutions which to-day prevent a realization of the wishes and aspirations of Freethinkers.

Lozano having finished his speech, a letter of adhesion to the congress from the president of the Mexican republic was read to the audience. This closed the first day's meeting. GUSTAVE NELSON.

The Importance of Education.

I venture to offer you a few thoughts on the education question, which is fast brewing a storm round our heads.

The recent conclave of bishops in this city for the purpose of discussing the question points out the course of the impending storm. While I am in no way an alarmist, neither am I a Napoleon in the burning Kremlin—I am not of those who think it time to draw the hose when the firebrands are crackling around the edifice. Ce maréchal lui montre des maisons converties de fer; elles sont toutes fermées, encore intactes.

We see Archbishop Corrigan instructing his minions to build parochial schools in every parish. We may look for the same course being pursued by nearly all, or all, the others. And what are we to do about it? This question is easy to ask and difficult to answer. I can only repeat a few lines I said many years ago, commenting on Rev. Mr. Peet's lecture on Temperance and Evolution, delivered at McPherson, Kan. He said in part, "Kansas was against slavery, first against whisky, and would be first to lead a crusade against Infidelity." I asked him, Did this mean a return to the scenes which characterized the blood-seething and -congealing chronicles of the butcheries, the burnings, the gloom of the Dark Ages? Does it mean the persecutions and hangings of the early annals of our country? He left uncharitable doubt to draw its own inference.

I have little faith in half-hearted laws. When my country is regenerated, when we have a higher standard of honor, a finer sense of delicacy, a loftier ideal, then will men be too noble to poison each other for lucre. The pulpit has failed and law has failed to cleanse the land of intemperance. I have based all my hopes on a higher standard of education. This, though some eight or nine years old, is still my only hope. I have no other panacea, no other love. She will aid and comfort you and me in every pain or sorrow, in every hour of life. I am uneasy when education is in danger. I have sacrificed time and means to acquire even the rudiments of an education. Now, where shall we stand regarding parochial schools? The state must preserve itself. It must at the same time guard our freedom. Can the state prevent the erection of such schools? Doubtfully. Ought it to do so? Perhaps not. Can the state be injured or impaired by them? Only slightly, and in this manner: The church is the party which cannot avoid injury in the outcome directly, and the state indirectly. The church simply throws round itself a Chinese exclusion wall, which will result in less than a generation in making Catholics the pagans of the twentieth century. Their advance will be that of the cowardly deserters from the army marching into battle. Its members in the great majority will know nothing more than to say the rosary, the catechism, and the mere rudiments. This is about the status of the parochial schools to-day. I remember well four of my classmates at Exeter, two of whom had taken three years Latin in the parochial school and were obliged to take first year Latin at Exeter. They told me their professors were utterly unable to translate Cæsar's bridge across the Rhine. One of them told me of a young priest acquaintance who had that same fall attempted Harvard entrance examination and failed to even pass Latin, and that is their hobby. Most of your readers will remember how very easily an Englishman successfully criticised Leo XIII.'s little poem of thirteen or fourteen verses or lines. The gentleman in question lived in this city at the time and was attacked by a Catholic Latin "prof," who showed Virgil had taken the same license which Leo was convicted of taking. The critic pointed out to the Latin "prof" that Leo had used the liberty in a few verses as often as Virgil did in the whole Æneid.

I know my Catholic parents saw little need of my studying much beyond the three R's and a good and thorough knowledge of the catechism and prayer-book. I have knelt on my knees and counted rosary beads till I ached at every nerve and my head was a howling pandemonium. I had not had a Bible in my hands before I was seventeen years of age. I was then under the guidance of the notorious Father Sweinberg, who mortgaged his church and school and gambled it away at Newton, Kan., and then ran away to France. I have heard nothing from him since. I defended my religion then in every manner, and a lady told me Catholics did not dare to read the Protestant Bible. I knew it was to all intents and purposes true, but I denounced it as false. She asked me if I would read her Bible. I said "Yes." I took it home, and began to put my spare moments on it. But my father denounced me so bitterly that I put it away and soon took it back. I nursed my wounded pride, and did not tell her my father would not let me read it. I hung on to my religion about five years more. I took up the Bible then, asking "Who shall make me lay it down?" I read and read. I read with a terrible vengeance. I went to confession no more. No more humbug Christs went down my throat. I no longer was a Catholic. No longer a Christian. I read the Irish World from boyhood for fifteen years, and was so poisoned against Darwin and evolution that I rankly abused them; demolished Ingersoll daily. In short, I was an ignorant, rude Catholic fanatic of the type so exactly portrayed by Draper in "Intellectual Development of Europe." I was too well aware of all this; no one knew or appreciated the fact keener than I. My weekly contributions continued to be read. I had completed a cycle. I was young, poor, friendless, and ignorant, with an unquenchable thirsting for knowledge. Here is where the church left me, or where I left it. I know all my relatives, with one or two saved, are still Catholic, and I know not one of them has ever read a page of the Bible. I had occasion to visit my old home, and I found only one of my old acquaintances possessed a Bible. They still pay their fees and go to the convent poor and needy. I went in my old church to hear a forty hour devotion sermon. The sermon was poor, the congregation poor, the collection plate displayed a great preponderance of copper. This scene is in the state of New York. The West is worse, where poor, foreign blabbers try to preach in English, who do not know enough English to ask for a morsel of bread. Passing by, a few months ago, the parochial school in Norwich, Conn., I noticed with pity the little scholars were ragged and scantily clothed, dirty-looking—of that sort which tells meaningfully of want at home. The better-off and brighter ones go to the academy there.

I have seen how parochial schools lower the standard of education by poor instruction poorly paid, by diminished hours of study occasioned by increased praying and religious study, by some studies being rejected totally, and more importance being placed on souls than bodies for the purpose of keeping the dollars coming in through fairs, picnics, and pilgrimages to humbug shrines down the St. Lawrence, and showing them how much better they are than their Canadian fellow-slaves.

These increased burdens increase poverty, and poverty hurts the state. How this effects elections is beginning to be noticed. The state may be unable to interfere. But where this system is used to turn the tide of elections or corrupt law-makers it is time for something to be done. When this machine uses its church sacraments to compel pay, and to compel parents to keep their children away from the public schools, the affair becomes serious. I see nothing now but conspiracy equivalent to treason. The state certainly has no right to attempt to make beliefs for anyone. Least of all has it a right to advance any sect or religious mob. Will the state endure with a large portion of its population in comparative poverty and ignorance? Yes. But it is unlikely to suffer it for any long period when the abuse is patent.

The finger of scorn will be pointed at the twentieth-century progress. I call to mind a discussion with a priest a few months ago in which he utterly demolished Evolution. He told me heat, cold, sound, light, and gravity were ponderable substances. He mistook bathybius for protoplasm, said species included family, and was appalled when I quoted authority for saying the bishop of Rome prayed on bended knee for the death of Arius before the council could meet, and that he was poisoned before the night fell down. He frankly told me he had not heard that before.

If any think I have overstated the case I refer them to a book published by a priest in Ohio named Thein and entitled "Christian Anthropology," which purports to be a text-book for priests, to enable them to hold their own against "Infidels." He says you may make a little concession in the length of time since the creation, provided you do not make too much; say make the period eight thousand to ten thousand years, not more.

The state has one undoubted remedy for this evil. This lies in compulsory attendance at school, and if the Catholics insist on the right of attending private schools the state can insist on its own standard and inspection. The church can only command respect while they can force contributions, and with increased burdens and increased poverty the dollars must stop their onward flow.

To the Agnostic it is of small import. The last census shows the Catholic church, notwithstanding foreign immigration, has not kept pace with the population. The defection is constant—among the lower classes through indifference and among the better educated through conviction. And the defection will be greater according as Agnosticism becomes able to offer employment and social standing, which it is fast becoming able to do. Many and many do I meet who tell me they go to church for the sake of relatives and social standing. The vast mass of Christians are simply pro tempore hypocrites. I have heard many and many a Catholic quote Ingersoll correctly and approvingly, and one only a few days ago said if he were on his dying bed he should not allow a priest near him. The family are all Catholics; one is leader in the choir; all live together. Thus there is a constant defection all over the world far exceeding the accessions. Though the church will endure long, it is on the defensive, and the church militant is driven under cover of parochial foolhouses. This does not remove them from intercourse with the world of progress, and Science will creep at first and finally flourish. It is too late to attempt to de-educate this world. The grandeur of the lives of men like Huxley and Darwin and Spencer can well divide the honors heretofore accorded Christ. These are trinities of trinities. Suppose I add another trio to the golden galaxy: Dana, Lyell, Tyndall. Yet another: Renan, Ingersoll, Romanes. The world needs no other gods than they. D. R. BARRY.

News and Notes.

I arrived at Washington on Wednesday, December 21st, in time to confer with the Exposition committee of the House of Representatives as to the Sunday-opening movement. Nothing will now be done in the House until after holidays. Meantime there is necessity for outside work. The following joint resolutions, Nos. 163, 168, and 177, have been introduced and referred to committee:

JOINT RESOLUTION

To provide for opening the World's Columbian Exposition on Sunday.

Whereas, by an act of Congress approved August fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, five millions of Columbian half dollars were appropriated to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an International Exposition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea in the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois, on the condition that the said exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and

Whereas the World's Columbian Exposition was not authorized, nor has the work of preparation been prosecuted, for the promotion of local interests, but on the contrary is purely of a national and international character and designed to promote the best interests, not only of all the people of our own nation, but of all the nations of the world who are to take part in, and contribute to, said exposition; and

Whereas within said exposition there will be representations of all that is good and useful, beautiful and artistic, all of which will be object lessons in science, art, education, and history such as are not likely to be again offered to the present generation; and as said exposition should be so conducted, managed, and controlled as will best promote the social, moral, and educational interests of all the people; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section four of "An act to aid in carrying out the act of Congress approved April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, entitled 'An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an International Exposition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea in the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois,' and appropriating money therefor," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modification of the rules of said corporation known as the World's Columbian Exposition as will prohibit the use, on Sundays, of machinery, unnecessary manual labor, and all merchandising, and at the same time give opportunity for the study of the highest standard of artistic and mechanical science; that the art gallery, horticultural building, and all other buildings in which exhibits of mechanical art are installed shall be thrown open to the public on each and every day during the entire term of the Exposition, and that each employee of said exposition shall be given one day of each week for rest, study, or recreation.

JOINT RESOLUTION

To provide for opening the World's Columbian Exposition on Sunday.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section four of an act of Congress approved August fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, to aid in carrying out the act of Congress approved April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exposition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois," and appropriating money therefor, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to permit the gates of the Exposition to be open on each and every day of the week: Provided, That all machinery, merchandising, and unnecessary labor shall be stopped within the grounds of said Exposition on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday: And provided further, That no employee shall be required to work more than six days in each week, and that it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by act of Congress approved April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modification of the rules of the corporation known as the World's Columbian Exposition as will give full force and effect to the provisions herein contained.

JOINT RESOLUTION

To repeal religious legislation pertaining to the World's Columbian Exposition.

Whereas the United States Constitution specifically states that "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" Therefore, be it ninety, entitled 'An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, by holding an international exposition of the arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea in the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois,' be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to leave the matter of Sunday observance entirely within the power of the regularly constituted authorities of the World's Columbian Exposition.

It will be seen that the first two resolutions are compromise resolutions. They are wrong in principle. They emasculate the Exposition. And for what purpose? Evidently to please the Christian element. Why should the machinery be stopped running on Sunday? Why should there not be merchandising on Sunday as well as other days? Simply because it is a "holy day." No other reason can be given, and therefore these compromise resolutions are a surrender of the Secular principle, and contain the germ of all sorts of ecclesiastical rule in the state. The third resolution, No. 177, is the correct resolution. It puts the whole matter on the right basis, that there shall be no religious legislation whatever, that Congress has nothing to do with the management of the World's Fair, that the commission should have sole authority.

It is not known which of these resolutions the House committee will report. There will be a discussion before the committee January 10th, 11th, and 12th. The committee will report about January 16th. I am frank to confess that I don't want any compromise. Let there be a plain sharp issue. Let the World's Fair be open on Sunday as on any other day or let it be entirely shut. To stop the machinery is in itself as much a surrender as to close the gates.

However, undoubtedly the bigoted religious element will oppose the compromise resolutions as heartily as a resolution throwing the entire Fair open on Sunday. The compromise resolutions will be a blow at old orthodoxy, if not a declaration of equal and exact justice. It will be a gain for "sweetness and light," but not a gain for real liberty.

I must confess that it is pretty difficult to get the hang of a politician. He is a "bright uncertainty." You can't pin him down. He is an "airy fairy Lillian" kind of a fellow. His reasons are plentiful, but there seems to be no logical basis. His springs of action are somewhat unaccountable. A prominent member of the House told me that he didn't want to discuss the Sunday bill as to its constitutionality, or upon religious or anti-religious grounds, but simply as a matter of justice. But how can you get at the justice of legislation without considering its constitutionality? If unconstitutional is it not injustice? And if legislation is religious, can we ignore the religious element? Evidently politicians are not guided by abstract principles at all, not by logic, not by the Constitution, but simply by the popular will. All the arguments in the world, all the truth in the world, all the logic, will not make a politician do an unpopular thing. Convince a politician that the people want a certain measure and he will favor it, Constitution or no Constitution. I had an idea that a constitutional argument on the Sunday question would be of some avail, but I am told that it will do no good. I am told that Freethought will be excluded, and also religion, in the debate before the committee.

I am pretty well convinced that the only way to deal with a politician is not by law or logic, but by the power of public opinion. Fortunately public opinion is with us in this case, and we must use it to the utmost advantage. If we could appeal directly to people our cause would be easily won. But the World's Fair commission have surrendered their rights. They have accepted the money granted by Congress and the conditions annexed. Congress alone can change the conditions. "The commission needn't come here and plead the baby-act," said a Congressman to me. "They have made a fair and square bargain. Let them stick to it."

The vote on the repeal will be a close one. Says the Washington Post:

The last canvass of the House in the matter of Sunday closure of the World's Fair is credited to Representative Baker. The result showed five majority against opening on the Sabbath. Representative McGann says, however, that he has since polled some of the members upon Mr. Baker's anti list and finds that they will vote to throw the gates wide, providing that no labor is done on the grounds other than that which is absolutely necessary. Though admitting that the race is desperately close, Mr. McGann is fairly confident that the Liberals will win. It is probable that the resumption of Congressional business will see a large number of prominent Chicagoans on hand, whose business it will be, of course, to present to members the reasons why the Fair should remain open all the six months around.

Now then, in view of the situation what should the Liberals of the country do? We have plenty of arguments, but the politician does not want arguments; he doesn't want the Constitution; he doesn't want the abstract right; but he wants to know the wish of the majority of the people. When he knows that he will decide without a moment's hesitation. I should advise this: Let every subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER write a letter to the Congressman of his district; get his neighbor to write a letter; pour in petitions. If you are personally acquainted with any Congressman send me a letter of introduction. I will see him. A personal conference is of value. The vote will be close—five or six majority either way. Quite a number are wavering. Bombard them with public opinion. Make them realize what the people desire. All this must be done in the next three weeks. Never was there greater necessity for Liberal effort. I honestly believe that the victory is ours if all the Liberals of the country will bestir themselves and give Congress a full expression of the people's mind. It is not the rightfulness of the thing but the popularity of the thing that we must present to Congress. I am sorry that we must plead before such a tribunal, but we cannot help ourselves. Let us accept the restrictions of the situation and pour in a concentrated fire of public opinion. We are with the majority this time. Let us make the majority felt. Write, write, write instantly to your Congressman. These paper bullets will tell.

On my way to Washington I stopped over a train at Lafayette, Ind., to see what might be done in this place for Free thought lectures. Mr. William Case, with whom for years I have been in correspondence, holds the fort. But there are very few to stand openly by him in the cause. Outwardly Lafayette is a very orthodox community. The churches are old and gloomy and seem to have full sway. Mr. Case is one of our staunch pioneers. He is seventy-seven years of age and looks strong and cheerful enough to live to be a hundred. He is a mighty hunter and can still shoot straight to the mark, and could tire me out with his day's wanderings over the prairies. He delights in music, is a skillful player, and has roamed through almost every state in the Union in the Thespian circles. He is a delightful companion, freighted with reminiscences of a long and interesting career. A few more like him and I think we could make Lafayette a grand place for Liberal effort. Under present circumstances, however, it is too forlorn a hope.

I lectured Sunday evening, January 1st, at the Temple, 425 G street N.W., in this city, on "The Bible and Modern Thought."

Address all communications to 1,325 G street N.W., Washington, D. C. I shall be pleased to receive any suggestions as to the work in hand from the Liberals throughout the country.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Colonel Ingersoll on Progress.

Colonel Ingersoll again lectured in this city on Sunday evening, January 1st. Every seat in the big Broadway Theater was filled, although it was storming furiously. In beginning his lecture he paid a tribute to the old and new years: "For countless ages the old earth has been making in alternating light and shade, in gleam and gloom, the whirling circuit of the sun, leaving the record of its flight in many forms—in stone, in growth of tree and vine and flower, in glittering gems of many hues, in curious forms of monstrous life, in ravages of flood and flame, in fossil fragments stolen from decay by chance, in molten masses hurled from lips of fire, in gorges worn by waveless, foamless cataracts of ice, in coast lines beaten back by the imprisoned sea, in mountain ranges and in ocean reefs, in islands lifted from the under-world, in continents submerged and given back to light and life.

"Another year has joined his shadowy fellows in the wide and voiceless desert of the past, where, from the eternal hour-glass, forever fall the sands of time. Another year, with all its joy and grief, of birth and death, of failure and success, of love and hate. And now, as the first day of the new o'er-arches all, standing between the buried and the babe, we cry 'Farewell and hail!'"

Continuing the colonel said: "Only a few years ago our ancestors lived in dens and caves, lived on berries and nuts—on everything that could be caught and killed with stones and clubs. Most people are chilled with horror at the thought of cannibalism, of man eating his fellow-man, but after all, is not cannibalism the most merciful way in which man has ever lived on his fellow-man? Is it not far better to fatten, and kill, and eat, than to enslave? The pain of dying is momentary, the sorrows of slavery may drag the lengthening chain for seventy years. For instance, a woman living in a tenement, surrounded by hungry children, sewing with tear-filled eyes for a few cents a day, would it not have been better for her at the age of fourteen, happy, fleshy, dimpled, to have been killed, roasted, and eaten? A grand dish at a festival, instead of a skeleton at a famine."

Colonel Ingersoll spoke of the great strides that have been made during the past half century—the telegraph, the telephone, the phonograph, the electric light and motor were all one. Speaking of this later on he said: "I believe that Thomas A. Edison has reflected more light upon the world than any millionaire that ever lived.

"What do we want next? We want Free thought. Let each brain furnish its quota of ideas. It is the great reservoir of human knowledge to which every man should be able to contribute. There are three things that a man must do—tell what he thinks, keep still, or lie. The respectable way is to lie. It was not until 1828 that a man was allowed to bring his case into court and then the man was not allowed to tell his story. They said: 'Why, he'll be tempted to commit perjury.' There is nothing more foolish in my opinion than swearing a witness. Whenever a man is sworn the jurors put him on an equal with God and believe he is in partnership with him. Let every man tell his story to the jury. Let them take into consideration the man's character. If you believe he tells the truth stand by him, if not, act accordingly."

In reference to two cases which have recently attracted much attention of the religious world he said:

"A little while ago in this city a priest who had dared to think and to give utterance to his thought was anathematized by the one infallible priest of priests, whose edicts of excommunication made thrones tremble in the past.

"This great ruler of priests, this vicar of Christ, issued his curse upon this priest who had dared to think—cursed him from his head to his feet, while he was eating and sleeping, while he was walking or talking, for all time, no matter what he was doing.

"And he called on God and the Holy Ghost and the mother of God and all the cherubim and seraphim and all the potentates of heaven and all who harp about the throne and the whole celestial outfit to join in the infinitesimal chorus and curse this poor man. And they all joined in. Yet the priest continued to have good health.

"But after a while the infallible one for some reason, or without reason, sent over a messenger to this country, one called the Rev. Monsignor Satolli, to review the action of the pope and hierarchy of heaven and the apostles of the Lord and the rest of them, and after looking into the matter, he informed them that they were all mistaken. And, according to report, the curse has been taken back."

The colonel proceeded to argue that this showed a healthy spirit and that the cursing power was losing force right along.

"A little while ago, too," he continued, "there was a trial in this city of a Presbyterian minister for a horrible heresy. Oh! an awful thing! Just think of it! This minister, it was agreed, had said his beliefs, not of a flattering nature to the old-time faith, which declared that there was only one path to heaven, and a mighty narrow one at that, in which you mustn't look ahead, and not very far back. You mustn't swerve to one side or the other, and if you got one foot over the edge you were gone.

"Well, this minister had the unheard-of temerity to say there were several ways to heaven and he was yanked up for heresy. He even went so far as to admit that the church, the Bible, and reason were things of actual existence, and he said that a man could go to heaven by reason. That's the way he ought to go!

"Old John Knox and Calvin and the rest of their crowd must have turned in their graves, I think, when it was decided by the Presbyterian church that this man was right, and that you don't have to have reason to get to heaven, but if you do have it it won't keep you out.

"Why, do you know that in a little while that Presbyterian church will be wanting to take me in? Fact. And they'll say they always did think there were three ways to heaven, anyway."

Telling what kind of a world he wanted to see, Colonel Ingersoll said, referring to Evangelist Moody's recent experience at sea:

"I want a world where people will not hire a man to pray and where they won't think that vessels are saved from shipwreck by the prayers of a wandering missionary. On the steamship Spree while in a storm there was prayer and they claimed that it saved her. On the Noordland, while in grave peril a little later, the passengers did not pray, but some of them actually played cards in the smoking-room. The event showed that so far as the power of salvation was concerned the two things were equal—poker and prayer."

He advocated restricting the right of franchise to the owners of homes, and passing laws for encouraging the establishment of homes, which, he said, were the nation's greatest need. He wanted laws passed also that would prevent us becoming a race of landlords and tenants, that would compel landlords to sell all the land they had and didn't need.

Then the colonel spoke of crime. "There are only two objects in punishing a man; one is to prevent him from doing more harm, the other to try and reform him. Let the very best men we have control the penitentiaries and other institutions, and not the basest. Mercy is better than cruelty. We know it because it brings happiness. After all is said and done there is only one crime, cruelty; only one virtue, generosity. If I had the power I'd have a man's arm paralyzed when he struck his wife, paralyzed when he pulled a revolver to shoot his friend, and so on.

"Compare the great inventors of our day with the millionaires. The inventor of matches, for instance, has done more for the world than all the rich men.

"I want you to know that surgery and medicine have made great progress. That's because men have stopped looking at the stars and gone to looking at natural causes.

"After all, we get our real throbbing joy from death, and if there was not any death I'm afraid there would not be so much love. It may be that love is a little flower that grows on the grave. I want to see a world without a slave and without caste."

Among the other things said by Colonel Ingersoll which evoked bursts of laughter or applause were:

"I do not believe we want a population of landlords and tenants. We want the people who occupy the land to own the land."

"The island of Manhattan once sold for $25, and when we consider the undesirability of the neighbors at that time I think the man who bought it paid too much for it."

"I would exempt the home from taxation. We can much better afford to pay for homes than for poorhouses and penitentiaries."

"Once when a man was found struck by lightning with a black mark on his breast, everybody thought he had spoken disrespectfully to a priest."

When Colonel Ingersoll had gathered up his notes and started from the stage, and while the audience was applauding, he stopped, and turning, said:

"I want to add that I never received a greater compliment than such an audience on such a night."

DURING the Middle Ages . . . we find cropping out everywhere the feeling that, since supernatural means are so abundant, there is something irreligious in seeking cure by natural means: ever and anon we have appeals to scripture, and especially to the case of King Asa, who trusted to physicians rather than to the priests of Jahveh, and so died. Hence it was that St. Bernard declared that monks who took medicine were guilty of conduct unbecoming to religion. Even the school of Salerno was held in aversion by multitudes of strict churchmen, since it prescribed rules for diet, thereby indicating a belief that diseases arose from natural causes and not from the malice of the devil; moreover, in the medical schools Hippocrates was studied, and he had especially declared that demoniacal possession is "nowise more divine, nowise more infernal, than any other disease;" hence it was, doubtless, that Pope Innocent III., about the beginning of the thirteenth century, forbade physicians, under pain of excommunication, to undertake medical treatment without calling in ecclesiastical advice.—Ex-President White of Cornell University in Popular Science Monthly.

The Last of the Priests' Tithe-barns.

The last in England of the monastic tithe-barns, the edifices in which the medieval abbots were accustomed to gather the tribute of those who owed them rent and service, is in process of demolition. It is the survivor of the two that were built at Peterborough, and dates back to 1307. It is a long and narrow structure with low walls and a massy oak frame supporting a singularly beautiful roof of gray stone slates. There is not a nail in the building, stout wooden pegs being used throughout. The historic edifice was bought by a builder for $5,500, and a vain endeavor was made by local antiquarians to have it preserved. But as Peterborough cathedral had just expended $45,000 for a new and very modern marble floor, there was no money left for sentiment of that sort and commerce claims one more conquest of antiquity.

HANOVERTON, O., Dec. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1 for some books. I used to give all the money I had to spare to the church. After I read "The Age of Reason" I got that notion out of my head. I was in a neighbor's house some time ago, and they commenced on hell. I told them if it was not for hell the churches would have nothing to do. It made the woman mad and she said I must be crazy. If the churches get any of my money they will have to steal it.

MR. EDITOR: What follows is substantially what was said by a clergyman in a sermon preached near this town a few Sabbaths ago from Luke vii, 36-46:

The strumpets who in us* believe
And love for us declare,
Who wash our trotters with their tears
And wipe them with their hair,
Are dearer to the God of love
Than purest women are
Who such profession do not make
But on a virtuous life the soul's salvation stake.

Letter from the Devil's Chief Angel.

YANKTON, S. D., Nov. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I will now seat myself and say a few words in regard to Freethought here. I have had a great many arguments with the people since I came here about eight months ago. I have made some converts to Freethought, and a few enemies. The pious people think I am the devil's chief angel, and it makes them mad when they try to corner me and fail to do so.

Mrs. Mattie Krekel gave us three lectures on the 14th, 15th, and 16th of this month, and a good audience was present. She is a good reasoner and pleases even those who are opposed to Liberalism, for she speaks pleasantly and unoffensively.

Yankton has a great many Liberals within its limits, and some of them make themselves heard.

I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is getting better every issue—not meaning that any one issue is bad, but all good things, we know, are capable of improvement as well as the bad. I enjoy hugely the way you knock superstition on the head. May you succeed in your every effort in behalf of humanity.

The Meaning of Two Terms.

KREBS, IND. TERR., Dec. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find check for $1.50, for which you will send me the Bible Picture Book in cloth. Please publish in your first issue of the new year the difference between a Freethinker and an Infidel. LEO BECKER.

[There is practically no difference between a Freethinker and an Infidel. The word "Infidel" means one who is without faith, or is unfaithful, being derived from the Latin in, not, and fidelis, faithful, from fides, faith. In Christendom it is applied to one without faith in the Christian religion; in Mohammedan countries, to one without faith in the Mohammedan religion, and so on. "Freethinker" in its widest application might be made to designate one who thinks freely, or without bonds and restriction, on any subject; but it is commonly used of one who thinks freely on the particular subject of religion. As whoever thinks freely on religion invariably becomes without faith in it—an Infidel; and whoever loses faith in religion goes to thinking freely on all or about all topics and thus becomes a Freethinker, the two terms are practically identical.—ED. T. S.]

Yes, Comment Unnecessary.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 14, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Carl Janda, a Polish workman, is in jail here for an indefinite stay. He was committed a week ago in default of payment of a fine of $25 and costs, making $34 in all. His offense is described in the warrant as "carrying a gun in the open air on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday." It does not appear that he discharged the gun or even that he was looking for game, although he was arrested under a section of the game law. He worked six days a week and could not go hunting, as can wealthy men, upon any day but Sunday. After three months in jail he may declare himself an insolvent and be released, if he can pay the cost of that proceeding.

Two years ago a German union of carpenters here decided to assist one of their members, a small contractor who had fallen sick, leaving a small house on which he was at work unfinished. They went to work on a Sunday and nearly finished the job, which would enable their sick comrade to draw his pay, when they were arrested for working on Sunday. Each of the prisoners lost a day's work in attending court and each was fined $5 and costs. Comment unnecessary.

Spiritualism and the Bible.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Dec. 24, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: One of your friends kindly lent me a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 3d. I noticed an article headed "Spiritualism," by C. Severance, Los Angeles, Cal. He tries to kill two birds with one stone. I think he knocks out Spiritualism. But I think he will have more than his match to knock out the great I am and all the religious world. He may fail to knock out Spiritualism if he has to contend with such champions as I find in the same paper who quote from our Bible and quote it wrong. "But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the almighty giveth them understanding." The writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER quotes it "him." And all that try to build up immortal-soulism, which is Spiritualism, and those who quote that verse in Job "him," are those who first got up an eternal hell-fire for the wicked. Now, Mr. Editor, I had E. W. Capron, the man who first brought to notice the Fox family, called Spiritual rappers. I had the charge of him one year and eighteen days. He died Apr. 18, 1892. And now people are asking me, "Have you seen or heard from Capron since he left this world?" I say positively, No. I have written to the Banner of Light and one other paper, and I have not heard a whisper from any of them. About forty years ago I was refused membership in an orthodox church because I did not believe that man had an immortal soul in him that will live in heaven or hell. Our Bible does not teach it, so I think. And yet I claim to be a follower of Christ.

MILAN, MO., Dec. 12, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I notice you are about to issue an extra edition of "Crimes of Preachers," and desire all who have examples to send them to you. Here are one hundred and twenty-five, gleaned from the few papers that came to my office in the space of eight months, when I began to gather them in. I thought to extend the good work indefinitely, but the crop was too large—could not spare the necessary time for the harvest. One day in my search for the beautiful I found in a St. Louis journal what might be termed an object-lesson—three preachers arrested for bigamy and kindred crimes, and in another column the account of our noble Ingersoll giving a lecture for the benefit of the penniless orphans of Ex-Speaker Witter, of Montana, buying tickets for himself and party, the lecture netting $1,500 for the children. How glaring the contrast—the most noted Infidel in the world by his generosity bringing sunshine and happiness and driving want from the home of the destitute, and God's chosen on the other hand carrying misery and shame perchance to a score or more, besides wrecking happy homes and destroying that which they can never restore. And yet this miserable crew by a little jugglery with God will get into heaven. Let heaven catch them, if there is a heaven and an after-life. There certainly must be, from the very nature of things, a place much superior to the orthodox preachers' home, where the Infidel, the intelligent, the great and the good, will find an abiding-place. Dechristianizing His Neighbors.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 1, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose herein $1.30, for which please send me the following herein-mentioned pamphlets which you advertise. Also will you kindly send sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the inclosed addresses? They are rather Liberal-minded, and at least some of them may be induced to become subscribers to the paper, which is certainly deserving a large circulation. And if you will send me a few extra copies I will take pleasure in distributing them. I wish to add that I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a few months past, and to say that I have been greatly interested thereby and highly amused by Heston's pictures is indeed expressing it very mildly. Although raised among orthodox Christians I have never since I have been old enough to be capable of doing a little thinking on my own account believed their eternal damnation story, and therefore I was easily converted to the noble cause of Freethought. I do not hesitate in the least to declare my unbelief in orthodoxy, and since taking the stand which I have I am surprised to find among my orthodox friends that some of the strongest believers are those who have not read the Bible, and when asked certain questions hesitate to say whether they believe certain things or not; but if told that it is found in the Bible will then say that they believe it. It reminds me of what a boy once said: "If pa says it's so, it's so, whether it's so or not." If it is in the Bible they will believe it "whether it's so or not."

Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER, and ditto Heston. I remain, Yours for reason, M. J. CUNNING.

True Christianity Kills.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Dec. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Christian Science is once more triumphant, and this time in this inter-mountain region in the shadow of the great Mormon Temple. That is, it has succeeded in sending another unbeliever in that idiotic superstition to kingdom come, and has once more demonstrated the efficiency of prayer in a manner that would cause the "vile" Freethinker to smile audibly were it not so pitiful. But a few more examples of this kind will have a decidedly beneficial effect upon the poor dupes who profess a belief in this criminal nonsense, if you will permit the expression.

Mr. P. F. Youngblood was a laborer living "over the Jordan" with his wife and two or three children. Now, Mrs. Youngblood is a disciple of Christian Science, and when her husband was taken down with a low fever she refused to call in a physician, and determined to give him a good dose of prayer and trust to God to pull him through. The sick man, who was an unbeliever, insisted on having a doctor, but his wife would hear of no such thing. She accordingly continued to administer prayer in great doses, but her husband continued to get worse, and his ailment finally developed into a case of typhoid fever. Then a friend sent Dr. S. Ewing to see him, who found the poor man in a very critical state, caused by failure on the part of the wife to summon help in time. She informed the physician that she did not believe in medical treatment, as she was a Christian Scientist. He, however, left medicine for the sick man, and it is said that it was not given him. He died. And then an application was made to the doctor for a certificate of death and burial. He informed the committee that the only certificate he would issue was that the deceased met his death from an overdose of Christian Science. But that did not suit them a bit. However, the body was buried on Friday. Great indignation was expressed on all sides at the case, and the matter received a good deal of unfavorable comment in the daily press here. HARRY E. GLENN.

FLAT CREEK, LA., Dec. 10, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inform you that I am not able to renew my subscription, and I do not want to break or cripple THE TRUTH SEEKER by taking the paper and not paying for it. It is now the tightest times about money that I have ever seen in this country or any other. I cannot get money on debts, for anything which I have, nor for anything that I can do. But cotton is going up and we are hoping for better times. I am now disabled from earning a living by labor by reason of diabetes, rheumatism, and the infirmities of old age. And I have an invalid wife to carry. I have made application for an invalid soldier's pension and perhaps I will have some money after a while. I saw T. P. Christy the other day. He had received a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER and said that he was going to subscribe for it. I have heard that a Mr. Sasser, of Caldwell parish, found a TRUTH SEEKER which I dropped on the road last year. When he went home he sent for his neighbor, Mr. I. C. Parker, now of Kelly, and they sat up all night and read THE TRUTH SEEKER and talked over it. My niece, Miss Ida Noble, went over there last summer to teach a school. She found out that Mr. Parker was a Freethinker, and took him into her confidence and gave him some copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and some other Freethought literature. He engaged actively in the propaganda, and won some converts from the church's flock. The chairman of the board of trustees of the school raised a racket with Miss Ida about it, and broke up her school three weeks before her time was out. But he did not hurt her in any other way. All of the other patrons and neighbors backed her, and he has had to retreat two or three times to keep from being whipped about it. The preachers have prejudiced the minds of the people against Freethought. But I am breaking down that prejudice by living a correct life and letting them know that I am a Freethinker, and by scattering around some Freethought literature.

P. F. SHUMAKER.

[Mr. Shumaker has our sympathy in his affliction, though some may say that it is at another man's expense, for we have credited Mr. Widdicombe's $2.50 to him, and set his date ahead one year, which allows us to get in fifty cents' worth of our own sympathy anyway. Mr. Shumaker has been on our list a long while, has written many valuable articles for the paper, and he shall have it right along whether he gets the pension or not.—ED. T. S.]

An Affair of Cigars Between Two Veterans.

NEW YORK, Dec. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a notice from your correspondent W. H. Fulton, dated November 19th, attracted my attention. It said: "I voted for Jackson in 1832 and now I have voted for Cleveland, making sixteen presidents I have voted for. If you have another subscriber who can go that and one better, he shall have the cigars." The writer of this article voted for Andrew Jackson in 1818—the first vote he had—which makes him now in his eighty-fourth year. At that time there were three days' election at the polls. And it was thought smart to get in a vote for Old Hickory. I have voted for every president since, the last one Grover Cleveland. So now, friend Fulton, hand down those cigars without any "ifs" and "ands." I should be delighted and much pleased if you could come and bring the bundle yourself, when we two old veterans will have a good, jolly old time over ginger ale and a good smoke at the Chapin Home, Sixty-sixth street, New York city.

I notice also you read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and cannot well do without it. That shows your head is level. How singular it is that as we grow old we have more reason than when we were young. This comes by experience, for it is our schoolmaster, which teaches us that supposing a thing to be so may not make it truth. I find by observation all the smart men are Freethinkers.

A good deal of work is to be done in our Freethought world, and much is crude, coarse work. The work that endures is that performed by the intelligent brain.

The Dr. Briggs trial for heresy has opened a wide field for the Freethought mind. He contends that the Bible is a proper subject for human criticism, that it is full of manifest errors, and hence he denies that it is the word of God. Dr. Briggs denies that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, and has on his side the preponderance of modern biblical scholarship. Dr. Birch on the trial said that Briggs had read Paine's "Age of Reason." That was one grand admission gained for Freethought.

The more the Bible is investigated and examined after truth the wiser will men become in respect to their future destination. All the theories, suppositions, and faith will evaporate and fly away like chaff before the wind.

Mr. Editor, don't let the above lie over too long—I want the cigars.

S. R. THORNE.

Jesus Heard From.

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Dec. 17, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I did not know that Jesus was a subscriber for your valuable paper, though I had thought if he was living in our day he would be—whether he is or not I cannot say—but by some means he read my article, "Which Was the Better Christian?" in your columns, and he straightway wrote me a letter. What do you think of that? A letter from Jesus! In the first place he gets off a sickly pun upon my name—which is a good one, by the way, and one I am not ashamed of, which is more than can be said of his, be it what it may, for he was ashamed to sign it to his communication, and I do not blame him. I suppose he felt called upon to vindicate the Christian religion. Well, all I have to say is, if that contemptible, disreputable superstition of a mythological age can find no more able defender than "Jesus alive" (as my unknown correspondent signs himself) it is truly in a deplorable, pitiable condition. It is now in order to sing the requiem, for it is dead, and "Jesus alive" is the putrid dead left to bury the dead. Then let me exhort you, bury it; and bury it well, that no noxious gases may escape to foul the breath humanity must breathe.

He denies being the author of the passage which I quoted, and which is ascribed to him by the gospel writers. The passage is Matt. v, 39: "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek turn to him the other also." He said in his letter: "Positively it was your spiritual father Judas who wrote it." It may have been Judas who wrote it for aught that I know, but why Mr. Jesus alive should call Judas my spiritual father is a mystery. Judas never denied Jesus, whereas I do; therefore, I think, there was another disciple whom it would have been more appropriate to have called my spiritual father. Not that I would give a snap for the difference, but it would have been more consistent. I refer to Peter. He denied Jesus, cursed and swore, and so do I.

It has struck me, since writing the above, that the letter was not from Jesus at all, but from some impostor. Well, stranger, I will say you are not the first impostor who has disgraced that name; and you, stranger, are not only a disgrace to that name, but would be to any name you might usurp, John Calvin's not excepted. You were afraid to sign your own name to your infamous letter, which shows you are a coward, and your letter bespeaks you a fool or a crank. Stranger, your true name is unknown to me, nor do I wish to know it.

You say water ran in Judas's veins but blood flows in yours! All right, let it flow. I have no wish to stop it. If meantime you could get a little reason to flow into your superstitious cranium it were well.

You may be a woman for aught I know; if so, I plead as excuse for my harshness your using a masculine nom de plume. If you are a woman, and what I have said seems harsh, I beg your pardon, for I have no right to abuse any woman except my wife; and it was your Bible, and your religion, and your Christian-made laws, which gave me the right to abuse her. Do I abuse her? No. I have too much love for her for that, and also too much inborn justice. I hold and concede her to be as free as myself. But your Christian laws make a wife her husband's slave in all except barter. If he makes his bed in hell there must she also lie.

In conclusion I would say, correspondence solicited with all the "Jesuses" and "Christeses" in Christendom or any other dom. If you write on postal cards please inclose stamp for reply. I am,

Yours in Progression,
JAMES POE CRYDER.

Guard the Schools.

IPAWA, ILL., Dec. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Home and freedom can live only in a secular country. Therefore every Liberal should inculcate Freethought into the minds of his children. Our forefathers had a great struggle to get out of the bloody clutches of the church, and we have as great a work before us if we keep for our children that glorious freedom so dearly bought. The self-named God's vicegerents are advising their dupes to vote any way to promote the growth of their peculiar creed and thus help God. They attack the school system because it opens up the channel for thought and makes men cry out against their hellish schemes. There never was a time when the free school system needed to be more sacredly guarded. The people should see to it that every school board is composed of patriots, and demand that they employ only patriots to teach their schools. In fact, no man or woman who holds any peculiar creed more sacred than country should receive a certificate. "These called-of-God men" (if men they are) are like cuckoos: they lay their eggs in the homes of their dupes, that they may be hatched and reared at the expense of the unthoughtful. They make their supporters believe that it is God's will that they do all they can to promote their creed and destroy others. This kind of teaching is a curse to any country, and instead of developing men and women it makes them haters and destroyers of one another. Such teachers are the real enemies of the human race; they suck the life-blood of the community in which they live and live like kings upon the contributions of the deceived. All reading people know the origin of the scheme of salvation and the cause leading to so many different denominations. The Apostle could not agree and did not agree, and the "called of God" do not agree to-day. There are so many parasites that they must divide the dupes so all can live. All students of history know the origin of Protestantism and the character of the originator. He was about as virtuous as the "man after God's own heart," and like David he was a murderer. The religion that compels honest, unthinking people to contribute to the support of such characters is ridiculous and a bad religion. Such a scheme could only hatch in the brain of the caste who pray to nothingness, and believe in a kingdom on earth—for those who believe in Christ believe that he will yet establish his kingdom among us. Poor, deluded faith! Reason teaches that such a thing cannot be. But there is danger that the people may attempt such a thing in Christ's name. We are all convinced that kingdoms on earth have enslaved and starved men and women. If earthly kingdoms are total failures, so far as justice and rights of individuals are concerned, why should we work for a kingdom come? In the name of justice and common sense call a halt and investigate, think, before it is too late. We have been imposed upon long enough. The money paid to the self-called if judiciously handled would drive poverty from the land. Why should the people pay large sums of money to men who try to tell them something about something or nothing that they know nothing about and have no way of finding out?

We need the spirit of a Henry, the wisdom and reason of a Paine, and the broadness of an Ingersoll to fight this cobra of superstition that has for ages been and is now poisoning the minds of so many that otherwise would be bright and shining lights. Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, said in a recent interview: "The daily schools should combine education and religion." What religion? Whose religion? He also said, "The head of the Catholic church was the son of a carpenter, and born in a manger." This informs us what religion and whose religion should be taught in our schools. Is it coming to this? Must grand old Liberal America give up her liberty? Must our grand free school system drift into nunneries? Must our old flag be devolved and dishonored into the Catholic cross? Time can tell. We believe with Jefferson that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and our salvation depends upon the energy of the Liberal intellectual giants.

Yours for freedom and the discontinuance of all religious creeds in our free schools,
C. S. RANDOLPH.

The Design Argument.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Dec. 16, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I have read with pleasure, and no doubt with profit, your scholarly attempt to arouse me from the lethargy into which you deem I have fallen. Permit me to say that you are the first combatant I have encountered in some years who attends courteously to the subject and fails to cry, "Fool!" I have ever entertained a high opinion of the "young philosopher" at THE TRUTH SEEKER'S helm and am thus strengthened in that opinion.

I hope that I may indulge sufficiently in egoism to hint as modestly as possible that, while I believe from your article you think me a kind of antediluvian fossil, I am not indeed such. I am not made that way. I have seldom been so oppressed by business as not to be able to apply from two to three hours of that day to such studies as shall keep me abreast of the times. This period is the happiest of the day, and is usually in the evening about a circular table surrounded by a good modern library, with one of the best little women on earth keeping along with me. The authors which you advise me to read are our constant companions.

You seem to misunderstand my position as to design somewhat. I am not led to a belief in design because of the "wonder" or mystery of a thing. When you place me on that ground you have an easy target indeed. I am led to a belief of this kind wholly freed from any thought of mystery, but because of certain phenomena in nature which seem to move consciously toward a certain attainable result. Now, as to the watch I have no quarrel with you so far as your blows fall upon the theologian. But when you assume me as thinking the watch indicates a designer because of its mystery I protest. I think you evade the subject when you state you know the watch to have had a designer by previous experience. That makes your case easy indeed. As shrewd a metaphysician as you show yourself to be must know that a lack of experience was presumed; otherwise we would have no question to discuss. Then again you notice this point, and assume that I am moving on the theory of mystery as before. When you come to this point and waive the previous knowledge, I think you do not help the matter by referring to the millions of other phenomena in nature which present (at least to me) apparent marks of design. This makes it very much like an identical algebraic equation, from which we find $x=x$. That there are millions of such things does not help to explain.

But with just how much light must we endow the finder of this legendary watch to make the parallel? Surely you would not take from him all other knowledge and then say, "Behold! he does not now seek a cause for this new creation, this watch, but he is content to look upon it as he does on every other phenomenon!" This would be an unmerited joke on Atheists; who, I grant, are among our finest thinkers. I suspect you have carried this disrobing point too far to be logical.

You say, "Another glance or two at the subject will hardly fail of bringing him where stand all genuine reasoners who have given the matter adequate attention." This is made stronger where further along you say, "... we recommend you to look up the late progress made in bringing them under natural law and you will find a call for a designer no longer." I am not aware of any remissness in this direction on my part. Yet perhaps had you grasped my weak point a little more clearly—reflecting more in keeping with your acknowledged mental vigor—you would not have written thus. Please think carefully on my mental difficulty here and help me out of it, my brother, if you see the way out yourself. Here it is. In connection with the above statement you say, "Darwin, Spencer, Haeckel, Bain, Mill, and Büchner will meet the purpose!" Now, my embarrassment is to understand how a still closer acquaintance with these philosophers would at all aid me in rising to the Atheistic plane when these men themselves never (with all their wisdom and knowledge) arose to this plane. I do not think you can find any positive evidence that any one of them is an Atheist. We often quote Darwin as to the origin of life, while the fact is he never entered upon a discussion of any such subject. The popular quotations from Darwin, and Darwin himself, are very different things. In his "Origin of Species" he shows us (essentially) how by certain accidental variations by reason of special environments and limitations species may change, vary, multiply, or disappear. But nowhere else has he discussed a subject in which the God question might be involved. Spencer has taken especial pains to explain that he is neither a Materialist nor an Atheist. I now allude to various published letters of his of more recent date in refutation of those who style him a Materialist.

Further as to the point of our belief in design vanishing after reading these men, why did not Professor Zöllner, the great German scientist, whose very profession made him necessarily familiar with the works of all such scientists as the above—why, I say, did they not make an Atheist of him? He believed in a supreme being, and a life after this, if we may believe him in his "Transcendental Physics." Prof. Wm. Denton, the peer of Darwin as a thinker, at least, who lost his life in search of the expansion of natural law, was necessarily familiar with these same authors and many others—he was not an Atheist but a Spiritualist in belief; also Professor Varley, A. Russell Wallace, Aksakoff of Russia, all men of science, all believers in a superior intelligence, and Spiritualists. Verily I see no proof of your statement that an acquaintance with such men would raise me to the much-coveted knowledge of Atheism.

You tell me that cyclones, comets, and storms are now fully understood. It is really your duty now to let our astronomers and meteorologists know this. What you overlook is the underlying cause of all things—not the proximate causes, which often a mere child could comprehend. For instance, you speak of tracing things to natural laws. Does it never strike you as being absurd to speak of there being a law without design?

When I see the pollen dust upon one tree or shrub, and its receptacle on another; a flower that closes its calyx to an injurious insect and opens it to one that will be of advantage to it; when I study the form of the bird's quill, the laws of the planets' orbital motion with the exact repulsion and attraction that has kept them to their places for millions of years—shall I be called a dunce for concluding these things indicate design?

I would beg to say that I once occupied the same belief you now entertain; by the study of nature's phenomena I think I have advanced from it. The human egotism to which you allude, is far more on the side of the Atheist than upon the side of the Deist.

But I fear I am taking too much of your space. Again I thank you for your courtesy, and the patient and masterly effort you make to help me on the God question. Fraternally yours,

B. R. ANDERSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Who Is King?

He who controls his appetites
And holds his passions bound,
On sea or land, or aerial flights,
He to the core is sound.

He worthy is to wear a crown,
A royal signet-ring;
With flowers his pathway should be strewn,
For he alone is king.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Open the World's Fair on Sunday.

It is a strange, unaccountable fact that so many men should stoop to better themselves at the expense of the community in which they live. Man always has been, and probably always will be, selfish, but such selfishness as closing the Fair on Sunday is an open slander against American people and American ideas. It is to be abhorred and denounced in whatever form it appears, whether clad in the multifarious robes of sanctity, or the envious greed of the rumseller.

Why should priesthood and clergy dictate the rule of a free country? Let them have a care. The horrors of the Inquisition, the beauty of witch-burning, a practice propagated by learned and refined Christians, the terrors of the Netherlands when state and church were one, show conclusively what the church can do when in power. The horrors of the Reformation must not be repeated.

What an edifying spectacle is presented to the world, the rumseller and the clergyman uniting in an effort to close the Fair. The hour comes when the very men who owe their existence to the different creeds will find that popular indignation, like a mighty inundation that started in many a little rill, will sweep the country of that useless element of modern civilization, the egotism of the clergy. If they continue to interfere with the liberties of the people, they in turn will lose their influence, power, and position.

Like the blast of a trumpet the clarion notes of a freeman ring out. The alarm has sounded. The cry "Shame!" comes from many thousand workmen. The repeal of that law is not far distant. The days of such kind, beneficial Christians as Constantine, Philip of Spain, and Mary of England are passed. Men no longer look with religious veneration, but with contempt, upon bigotry. The framers of our Constitution declared state and church must always be separate, and we should follow their advice to avoid danger.

The clergy must keep their place nor infringe upon the rights of the people. Human liberty is too precious to be hampered by any fetters. If Jesus their leader has sounded the keynote of human kindness, his disciples would do well to follow his example. Why not give all classes a chance, all races an equality, and all opinions a free, uncompromised toleration?

Open the World's Fair on Sunday. Let the poor man view the grandest things of earth without losing a single day of labor, without sacrificing the wages of a single hour. If you do this you not only present to view of the world your country's products, your country's wealth, but also your country's freedom, pure and undefiled. You thus give your countrymen the strongest possible position, For manhood is mighty where manhood is free.

You may close the Fair on Sunday, partly fill the churches, and keep intact the name of intolerance the early settlers bequeathed us; but, on the other hand, you add many thousands to the already innumerable victims of all sorts of current vice. You benefit the churches and the wicked, but you deal a terrible blow at liberties of the country, home, and people.

Finally, if you treat the poor man fairly the others will look out for themselves.

And to whom do we owe more than to the poor man? Goldsmith says:

Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
A breath can make them as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied.

[The above creditable essay was written by a bright young gentleman of fourteen—a high-school student. It was read in school. We regret that our young friend's modesty will not permit us to give his name to our readers, but as genius is always recognizable, his name will probably some day be widely known.—Ed. C. C.]

Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5, 1892.

MISS WIXON: Now you have been good enough to give publicity in the Children's Corner to my letter of the 11th of November last, I take the liberty of calling your attention to another impropriety I have noticed in this city, and I suppose is the same all over the country.

On the elevated railroads, surface cars, and other public conveyances I have invariably seen the men comfortably seated reading newspapers or sleeping—this when returning from picnics—while the ladies were standing up, suffering all sorts of inconveniences. Is the world upside down? Can there be anything more ridiculous than such sights in a nation that pretends to be at the head of civilization? JOSEPH FELIX GONZALEZ, Nativ of Porto Rico.

NOBILITY, TEX., Nov. 30, 1892.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: I thought I would write to the Corner, as I have never seen anyone writing from this place. My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since before I could remember. I am thirteen years old. I like to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially the Children's Corner. I have just returned from a trip to St. Louis. Papa went with me; we were gone fifteen days. St. Louis is six hundred and fifty miles from here. I have been sick for some time, and will not be able to go to school this winter. I have one brother; we are the only children mamma has. There is a young girl living with us. Her name is Agnes Taylor. We see a heap of fun here. There are not many Freethinkers here in this little village. There is one dry-goods store, one grocery store, and a blacksmith shop. As this is my first letter, I will close for fear of the waste-basket.

From your Liberal friend,
DORA MORROW.

CARLSBAD, CAL., Dec. 12, 1892.

MISS WIXON: I would like to obtain a small space in the Children's Corner. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for seventeen years, and will always take it. I am a young Freethinker and am not ashamed to say so. I am not one of the kind of Freethinkers who is a Freethinker when he is with the Freethinkers and a Christian when he is with the Christians. I say, Be a Freethinker or a Christian; don't be astraddle of the fence; come over one side or the other! I do not have anything to do with the church or church doings. This town is not much of the church order. Some people are afraid to talk as they believe. I am not. I talk just as I believe and like to see other people do the same. This is a free country. Again I say, speak up for your rights. Wishing to see this in print, I will close for this time.

From your Freethinking friend,
CLINT CULVER.

[There's a brave, candid, outspoken lad for you. Who shall say we have not as fine a lot of lads and lassies as can be found in the country? And they are all willing to stand up and be counted as staunch and true Liberals!—Ed. C. C.]

NORTH HURON, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have not written a letter since you returned home, so will write a few lines to-day for the Children's Corner.

For a week past we have had beautiful sleighing, and I as well as my little dog Bruno have enjoyed ourselves very much riding on my handsleigh. I have a little harness so I can drive him the same as a horse, but he is not large enough to draw me.

My school commenced November 21st, and my teacher's name is Albert Richardson, this making three winters with us, and we like him very much, as he takes great interest in the school. I study this term geography, history, grammar, writing, arithmetic, and spelling.

I will be eleven years old the 22d of this month and I am thinking of attending school at Clyde next term. I have given up my music lessons for the winter, thinking my school studies are enough, as I am not a very healthy little girl.

Christmas will soon be here and I shall be anxious to see the Children's Corner to see what presents they all received. Mamma thinks I am getting too old to expect to get many toys, so I shall look for something that will be of some benefit to me.

If you make a visit to the World's Fair next summer I would like very much to have you make us a visit if you can do so. Grandpa says if I was a little older I could go.

As this letter is rather lengthy I will write no more at present. With my best wishes to you and my Corner friends, I remain, Sincerely, BERTHA E. WEED.

SEIAD VALLEY, ORE., Nov. 30, 1892.

DEAR MISS SUSAN H. WIXON AND THE CORNERITES: Seeing that the communications are scarce in the Corner, I thought I would write a few lines for it, as I have been wishing to do so for some time. We take THE TRUTH SEEKER all the time and we think it a very good and interesting paper for everyone to read. Well, this is my first article on this subject to any newspaper. As I have been for several years studying the Indian's ways, I thought it would be best and interesting to put a small piece in the Corner. When the whites first came on the Klamath river, about 1850, there were several hundreds of Indians, and they were doing well. They live principally on acorns, manzanetta, and all kinds of meat and berries. The race grew weaker every year up to this present moment. I will say that it would now be a great job to scare up one hundred and fifty. The increase is very small.

Most of the squaws were bought by the miners and settlers.

The Indians are all fond of whisky, and would sell anything they have for it. When drunk they are fighting, squalling, and howling. They believe in the devil and Holy Ghost. They do not believe in education.

They will keep their dead five days before burying. All this time a fearful howling going on, swearing, and cutting of hair.

The bigger the devil the more they like him. They are more superstitious than a lot of ignorant Catholics.

Now, all do your best, and believe me to be your Liberal friend.

Well, my letter is too long already, so I will close.

I hope to see it in print.

Success to all. S. C. PHILLIPS.

Got His Cards.

Tommy had just returned from Sunday-school, and his mother asked him if he had been a good boy.

"Not very," he replied.

"Then you didn't get a good-behavior card?"

"Yes, I did. I saved the money you gave me for the heathen and bought two cards with it from the other boys."

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

News of the Week.

THE important statement is made by expelled Rabbi Rosenberg, of New York city, that he did not eat ham.

At Hamilton, Ont., Evangelist Edward Best stood at his open window and prayed to the Lord to curse and destroy his neighbor with cholera and small-pox. He was arrested and fined $10 and costs for disorderly conduct.

At Coloma, Mich., Thurston Carter, leader of a new sect called the Chosen Seven, declared that God had commanded him to sacrifice his child. His wife wrenched a butcher-knife from him before he could plunge it in the infant.

EDW. HALLINGER, a colored Baptist preacher, was hanged at Jersey City for the murder of his mistress. He spent his latter days in consultation with his spiritual adviser, the Jesuit father Finnigan, and in reading the great Catholic work of St. Thomas à Kempis.

"SEE Chicago and die," it is said, is a maxim that will be literally carried out this year by many. Typhoid fever and other contagious diseases are expected to spread there. Diarrheal diseases caused by fatigue, exposure to cold or heat, and improper or unusual diet, will abound at the Fair and after return home. All this even if cholera does not enter.

In the late Irish elections, says Justice Andrews, who, with Justice O'Brien, unseated Fullam, "the whole organization of the church was thrown into the contest. Every priest was a canvasser. They canvassed everywhere, on the altar, at the houses, on the roads." It is alleged, and Mr. Justice O'Brien thinks it true, that they canvassed in the confessional.

THE board of estimate and apportionment of New York city, which does not hesitate to squander the people's money on Catholic institutions and jobs by which politicians can profit, has refused to give the Museum of Art such a sum as will enable it to keep open Sundays. Unless something unexpected intervenes, the Museum will resume its former custom of Sunday closing.

BEFORE the opening of the Protestant church in Madrid, Spain, in which country any church not Catholic has rarely been tolerated, a deputation of eight duchesses, seven marchionesses, eight countesses, and several of the queen-regent's ladies-in-waiting visited Premier Sagasta to protest. He declined to interfere and the ladies departed angry. The Catholics of Madrid organized a street demonstration against the premier in which the schoolchildren took part.

MCGLYNN has been readmitted to the exercise of his priestly function. It is not thought that he will be allowed to return to the same church. No one knows the negotiations which have passed. It is believed that he has made some pledges or submission. It is commonly supposed that the motif of the church is unwillingness to lose the large number of members who were personally attached to him, and especially to lose their present financial contributions. The Peter's Pence from America fell off considerably because of his affair.

THE priest of the church at Canton, Minn., which possessed a miraculous picture on a window, said before it had been removed: "From the expression I am confident that some great plague—cholera or something—is to visit the earth. The crucifixion and Mary and Joseph have also appeared on the glass. Skeptics have gone up there and scraped that glass and poured burning acid on it, but Our Lady is still there. The skeptics all went away convinced. . . . The list of absolute cures is enough to confirm any skeptic that the mother of God is here. One of the most marvelous of recent cures is that of F. H. McBride, of Chicago, who, after being advised by physicians to have his legs amputated, was carried here. He walked away. The cures number hundreds."

MR. O'BRIEN, of New York city, a member of the board of aldermen, at the latest session of those functionaries moved that as "this large city, so plentifully supplied with clergymen, affords every opportunity for those anxious to enter the matrimonial state," the legislature divest the aldermen of the power to perform the marriage ceremony. Alderman Flynn replied: "If the gentleman from the Telescope district knew a little more law he'd know that a civil marriage is necessary for foreign persons if the union is to be recognized as legal in their countries. If he'd study up his Blackstone, Kent, and Marshall a little more he'd know more about the necessity for these marriages. The gentleman throws a bad odium over the board with his resolution. He's very conscientious in this. There may be something he ain't so conscientious about." The resolution failed.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career have been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I have found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs. In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. 2. Miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. 3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporary history. Bennett affirms; Mair denies. This is an exhaustive discussion. Price, $1.50.

BOOKS.

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject. In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stipendiature; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continuity even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

ALL excess is incompatible with health and with happiness.—Epicurus.

It is the duty of every man to destroy the superstitions of his time.—Ingersoll.

THE eye which can appreciate the naked and absolute beauty of a scientific truth is far more rare than that which is attracted by a moral one. Few detect the morality in the former, or the science in the latter.—Thoreau.

THE Middle Ages were more religious than ours in proportion to their greater ignorance and barbarism; and at present the same difference exists, for example, between Spain and Germany, or in Germany between Tyrol and Saxony. Religion and civilization accordingly occupy not an equal but an inverted position in regard to each other, so that with the progress of the latter the former retreats.—Strauss.

We are fooled with martyrdoms that make us break out into laughter. The Tituses, the Trajans, the Marcus Aureliuses, are painted as monsters of cruelty. Fleuri, abbé of Loc Dieu, has disgraced ecclesiastical history by tales which a sensible old woman would not tell to little children.

A hundred tales of this sort are found in the martyrologies. The narrators have hoped to render the ancient Romans odious, and they have rendered themselves ridiculous. Do you want good well-authenticated barbarities—good and well-attested massacres, rivers of blood which have actually flowed—fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, infants at the breast, who have in reality had their throats cut, and been heaped on one another? Persecuting monsters! Seek these truths only in your own annals: you will find them in the crusades against the Albigenes, in the massacres of Merindol and Cabrière, in the frightful day of St. Bartholomew, in the massacres of Ireland, in the valleys of the Pays de Vaud. It becomes you well, barbarians as you are, to impute extravagant cruelties to the best of emperors; you who have deluged Europe with blood, and covered it with corpses, in order to prove that the same body can be in a thousand places at once, and that the pope can sell indulgences! Cease to calumniate the Romans, your lawgivers, and ask pardon of God for the abominations of your forefathers!

What name shall we give to your executioners? Phalaris and the Busiris were the gentlest of men in comparison with you. Does not your inquisition, which still remains, make reason, nature, and religion boil with indignation?—Voltaire.

To say that every vegetable and animal species is the special result of a distinct divine fiat is to put a veto upon all scientific inquiry in the region of biology. But to-day such a veto comes too late. The world has learned too much under the guidance of the doctrine of evolution, too many regions of knowledge have been fertilized by it, too many individual minds have found in it a never-failing spring of instruction and intellectual stimulation, for any overthrow, or even any obscuration, of the idea to be possible. What, we ask, have its opponents to teach? They are compelled to recognize the general principle of evolution in history, geology, and many other fields of research, and so far as they do, their intelligence has free scope. But what do they teach instead of it in the field of biology? Absolutely nothing. They simply draw a line and say, "Here begin wonder, miracle, mystery, all that is arbitrary and thought-confounding." To the opponent of evolution the resemblances, analogies, and homologies that run through animated nature are simply so many false lights, ignes fatui, suggesting community of origin where community of origin there is none. Rudimentary organs signify nothing, neither do the facts of embryology. All that can be said is that God made things as they are, rudimentary organs and all, just as suited himself. If different species and genera show resemblances, it is simply because the same ideas kept running through the Divine Mind. Such is the sum and substance of anti-evolutionist teaching. That it is anti-scientific, and that it tends to nothing less than paralysis of the intellectual powers, is evident at a glance. Fortunately it is confined nowadays to synods and conferences, and even there is not received with entire favor. At the recent Ecumenical gathering of Methodists at Washington an earnest divine from the Southern states found some of his brethren, particularly those from England, badly infected with evolutionary ideas. A similar discovery might be made in almost any similar assembly to-day. Evolutionists may therefore proceed very contentedly with their studies. They are in the right path, because they believe in the universality of natural causation.—Professor Youmans.

BIBLE MYTHS;

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity, CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT IN THE Reynolds Blasphemy Trial, At Morristown, N. J.

Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Problems for Freethinkers.

A press of matter this week compels us to defer till our next issue our further reply to Mr. B. R. Anderson on Design and Theism. This matter of Theism, we will take this opportunity to say, we believe to be of considerable significance. For a very large portion of the people, we estimate, who have detected the falseness of Christianity, nevertheless still entertain a belief that there is a God, though not the Christian one. And as people believing thus incline to sympathize with worshipers of the Christian and such gods, thinking that as there is a God it is perhaps better that he be adored under varying and mistaken forms than under none at all, the outcome is harmful. A main reason of the indifference of Infidels, so often complained of, is this fact that a large part of them are Theists. Atheists are much better helpers in the fight against ecclesiastical tyranny than are Theists. If our readers will ask of each of their Liberal friends in turn if he believes in a God, and if so just what piece of evidence it is that leads him so to believe, and write to us the result of the canvass, it will, we think, be interesting. To be sure, unless the letters are short we fear that some will get shut out of our crowded columns, which are unable to contain all the good matter waiting even now.

Further, we may remark that our readers will find much entertainment and improvement in following out for themselves the lines of thought opened up by this Theistic problem. Such questions as (a) Is there a God? (b) Why was one supposed? (c) If there be, just what is the evidence? (d) Is he most evidenced by our intuitions? (e) Or by our moral principles? (f) Or by our intellectual faculties? (g) Or by the physical universe? (h) Or by design in vegetable or animal nature? (i) If there be not a God, what is the evidence? (j) Is Atheism or Agnosticism the more reasonable?—such questions as these, we say, asked by everyone of himself, and pushed to an answer, will elicit interesting and useful reflections. These, again, lead to other problems—which, by the way, Christians often demand that Freethinkers solve—such as (k) What is life? (l) Where does it begin? (m) What is consciousness, or mind? (n) Where does it begin? (o) What is morality? (p) Where does it begin? (q) How can it be fostered? and a thousand others. Freethinkers need not stop short at denial of Christianity and arraignment of priest craft and preachercraft. This denial and arraignment are necessary, most necessary. But the negativ and fault-finding character of these activities may often pleasantly be alternated with work on lines more directly constructiv and more genial. While the pious are bedeviling their unfortunate brains over their barren and profitless nonsensicalities, Freethinkers may be enjoying and upbuilding themselves in trains of thinking pleasant and far-reaching. We hope to get, during the year, enough remission from such of our editorial labors as are more specially directed against historical Christianity and ecclesiastical abuses, to indite some columns on these subjects. Evolution, a principle which runs through all of them, and which is of particular fertility and charm, we surely must not fail to touch. Engaged in such researches, our readers will find—as it has been phrased—divine Philosophy not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose, but musical as is Apollo's lute.

Freethought Converting Clergymen.

Two weeks ago we narrated the progress for several days of the trial of Rev. Dr. Briggs for heresy. On succeeding days the process of beyelping and benibbling this gentleman for not being a dunce or a hypocrit continued. Dr. Birch, assisted by Dr. Lampe, headed the horde of theologs who were so determined on keeping the oath which they had taken at their ordination not intellectually to advance. Birch's physiognomical appearance is what one would expect—that of a narrow-souled old bigot. Dr. Briggs's aspect is one of pleasantness and courage, not without a certain degree of intelligence.

On some days the preachers got to quarreling among themselves, and displayed much bitterness. Once one told another in so many words that he was no gentleman. We do not stick to say that most of the preachers present were no gentlemen. It is essential to the character of a gentleman that he be a truth-teller. Over half of the clergy at the trial, we estimate, must be aware that what they preach weekly is lies.

In summing up his defense to the two charges of denial that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, and that Isaiah was the author of a certain half of the book that bears his name, Dr. Briggs said:

“The Westminster Confession of Faith nowhere states that Moses wrote the Pentateuch or that Isaiah wrote the whole of the book that bears his name. Therefore there can be no lawful case against me in the Presbyterian church. The testimony of holy scripture in the passages adduced does not show that Moses wrote the Pentateuch and that Isaiah wrote the book that bears his name. Therefore my statements are not in conflict with holy scripture and there is no valid case against me on the ground of holy scripture. Holy scripture makes it evident that Moses did not write the Pentateuch and that Isaiah did not write half of the book that bears his name. Therefore my statements are true and the prosecution are in conflict with holy scripture.”

Much more as pointed was said by the abandoned heretic, who finally declared that his opponents dwell in a cave of dogmatic faith and are as blind as bats to the world of reality, the truths of history.

Rev. Jos. Lampe, D. D., made a lengthful defense of his preposterous scriptures. One of his observations was:

“A biblical scholarship which is not in subjection to faith has always led to doubt, negation, and weakness.” Quite so. Then cried Lampe indignantly;

“It has been stated that Dr. Briggs knows more about the Bible than all his co-presbyters taken together.”

If Dr. Briggs does not know more, he at all events tells more. He has not the ignorance of some, or the mendacity of others. He is not a fool like some or a liar like others.

Prosecutor Lampe next insisted:

“But the Presbyterian church places faith above mere scholarship. It recognizes the truth that the one supreme and distinguishing characteristic of Christian people is that they are believers. They are an army of believers, called of God to fight the good fight, in which, not learning, but faith itself gives them strength and courage, since by it they lay hold of the arm of the Lord and make real the help of heaven for the conflict on earth. The power of the church is measured by its faith in the truth and promise of God. And so it has ever been the supreme duty of the church to guard against that falling away which comes through a desire for new things.”

Of course it is true, as the reverend here says, that “the Presbyterian church places faith above mere scholarship.” It indeed places faith above scholarship, and above fact, logic, and all that has any relation to common sense.

It is with smile-wreathed faces that observers will assent that “the distinguishing characteristic of Christian people is that they are believers.” “Believers” is indeed the apt term for Christian people. Never, never would Christians have been designated by us as examiners, investigators, discerners, or judges.

“Not learning,” continues the pulpiteer, “but faith itself, gives them strength.” If all that is needed to please this divine is an abstinence on our part from accusing Christians of strengthening their cause by learning, we assure him that he shall be pleased.

By this faith, we are further informed, Christians “lay hold of the arm of the Lord.” If they will stop at this and not go on to lay hold of the arm of the state, we shall make no plaint. We flatter ourselves that we could very creditably contend against the arm of the Lord; it is the governmental arm which these dissemblers have always insisted on using as backing, that has overcome and despoiled us.

Rev. Mr. Lampe rounds his paragraph with an admonition to the church to guard against “a desire for new things.” It would never have occurred to us that that institution needed such a caution. That body has, to be sure, introduced in the line of machines of torture some innovations and improvements. Some such instruments as the rack, the thumbscrew, the iron boot, the pincers for tongue-tearing, etc., have been either elaborated, or wholly invented, by the Christian church, with no little radical ingenuity; but apart from this advancement in a branch of mechanics of only subordinate usefulness we find no evidence of guilt of the horrible sin of progress.

Next blusters this parson militant:

“Objections are raised only against the methods of what is known as the higher criticism, the most distinguishing feature of which is its audacity. Intoxicated with its own immensity, it has brought itself under deserved suspicion. It brands a distinguished company of Christian scholars, who have done yeoman service in the maintenance and defense of God's truth, as mere traditionalists, who, in ignorance and prejudice, have despoiled the people of their Bible by erecting impassable barriers about it, and presents itself as the one great oracle of truth and certainty.”

Certainly if the traditionalists had “despoiled the people of their Bible by erecting impassable barriers about it,” we should place ourselves plump in favor of them. But this phrase, like a verse of scripture, “means something else.” Those poky animals known as traditionalists have not really taken the Bible from the people bodily and holus-bolus. They have only misexplicated all its parts after their own happy way. Sometimes doing good, as by cloaking the lasciviousness of Solomon's Song under the pretense that the book is all about Christ's love for the church, they have, as Dr. Briggs intimates, done more harm, by feigning that the books had known and dependable authors, and by this means preventing the whole volume from sinking to its true human level. But we must not pause to enlarge upon the doings of these traditionalists, but proceed to the enjoyment of the next gem of thought dealt out by our amusing Lampe:

"Nothing, this higher criticism claims, has been settled by the great thinkers of the church during more than eighteen centuries."

This charge of Dr. Briggs, or of the higher criticism, is undeniably warranted. Christian commentators, as Thomas Paine remarks in his epigrammatic way which produces such comic effects, "have disputed and wrangled, and anathematized each other, about the supposable meaning of particular parts and passages; one has said and insisted that such a passage meant such a thing; another, that it meant directly the contrary; and a third, that it meant neither one nor the other, but something different from both; and this they call understanding the Bible."

Pretty soon this dullish old parson got upon the article of indictment which charges Dr. Briggs with teaching the doctrine of sanctification after death. This teaching is to the effect that after the death of the body the soul enters a state in which it gradually develops and improves. On viewing over the mental and moral make-up of this prosecutor, we are moved to express—not, to be sure, a belief, but—at least a hope that this is so.

Next we light upon something shocking. A childhood's ideal is shattered:

"Dr. Briggs illustrates his idea of sanctification in the next world by a reference to Abraham. In this life, he affirms, the old patriarch lived on so low a stage of moral advancement that, did he live now, we could not receive him in our families, and might be obliged to send him to prison lest he should defile the community by his example. But he states that 'when he went into the abode of the dead he held his preeminence among the departed. He made up for his defects in this life by advancing in the school of sanctification there open to him.'"

In reply to this Dr. Lampe warily forbears canvassing Abraham, contenting himself with wanting to know "where Dr. Briggs gathered all this information" about progressive sanctification. Then he tackles a new point:

"But, says Dr. Briggs: 'It is unpsychological and unethical to suppose that the character of the disembodied spirit will all be changed in the moment of death.' And this is probably the real ground of his objection to the received doctrine. The fact has already been referred to in this case that Dr. Briggs, unconsciously to himself it may be, is under the influence of a philosophical principle of naturalism. It runs in a greater or less degree through all his writings, and here he yields to it so thoroughly that anything contrary to it must not even be supposed to be true. According to this psychological and ethical principle the transformation of a saint of God in the dying hour to perfect holiness must be held to be a magical illusion. But the divine grace often works great transformations very suddenly which are not at all magical nor illusory."

Lampe thinks it deplorable that Dr. Briggs should be, "unconsciously to himself," "under the influence of a philosophical principle of naturalism." Abhorred of the church has ever been naturalism, like everything else commendable and beneficent. But just as true as that this clergyman and many of his brothers are under its influence, with which we Freethinkers are tirelessly imbuing all the branches of thought—just so true is it that in the end this hated Naturalism, and naught but it, shall triumph and reign, and its enemy, Supernaturalism, be cast into outer darkness forever.

Then, too, our prosecutor is disquieted by the apprehension—

"There is also so thin a wall or partition between this doctrine of progressive sanctification in the middle state and the Roman Catholic doctrine of purgatory, that the former will very readily slide into the latter. It will also open the door to far wider divergencies from the faith."

The doctor forgets the exceptional utility of the doctrine of purgatory for bringing in money—for which end, indeed, some say it was specially got up.

"Dr. Briggs presents a doctrine of the holy scriptures which completely undermines its infallible authority as the only rule of faith and conduct. With an extensive field of circumstantial errors pervaded by errors of which no one knows the number, and in which it is impossible to draw the dividing line between what is essential and non-essential, and with a text that is merely human, in which the exact residuum of divine truth cannot be determined, we have a Bible on which no one can rest with certainty or build with joyous confidence."

Yes, it is to be feared that if the Briggsian doctrines prevail we can no more "build with joyous confidence" on those beautiful beliefs such as that most of our brothers and sisters and sons and daughters will enter at the broad gate to fire-girt writhings everlasting.

However—

"The Presbyterian church feels in conscience bound to continue her unbroken testimony for a truthful Bible. . . . It is plain that Presbyterians desire to keep their old faith in this respect in its purity. They do not want to foster these new doctrines of Dr. Briggs. . . . Jealous regard for the old faith is a good thing, and is especially to be commended when the minimizing of great truths is so much in fashion. The tendency of our age to believe as little as possible is sapping the strength of faith and depriving the Christian life of its vigor."

When the vote came to be taken Dr. Briggs was acquitted on each of the six counts. The votes varied on the several charges. On the third count, which was "Teaching that errors may have existed in the original text of the holy scripture as it came from its authors, which is contrary to the essential doctrine taught in the holy scriptures and in the standards of the said church, that the holy scripture is the word of God, written, immediately inspired, and the rule of faith and practice," the votes were 68 to 61.

The fourth charge was that the accused had taught that the Pentateuch was not written by Moses, but consists of two parallel narratives by different men, these subjected to changes by ancient Jewish editors. On this the vote was 72 to 53.

On the sixth charge, which was "Teaching that sanctification is not complete at death, which is contrary to the essential doctrine of the holy scripture, and of the standards of the said church, that the souls of believers are at their death at once made perfect in holiness," the vote stood 69 to 57.

Neither the parties engaged nor any of the public have been able to make out whether the vote was on the question whether these doctrines are true, or on the question whether the accused had uttered them. Dr. Briggs, for his part, avowed the utterance, and continued it throughout the trial. No one knows just what the voters have done, not even themselves. The plainest thing about the matter is that a good many clergymen admired Dr. Briggs personally and voted as they thought would help him.

The trials of the case have but begun. It must now go through heaven knows how many synods and general assemblies.

When St. Elliot P. Shepherd heard the verdict he lugubriously inserted in his pious Mail and Express the following solemn reproach:

"When the ministerial judges confront their congregations to-morrow morning many of them may find that their people think that they have pronounced, as agreeable to the Bible and laws of their church, the assertions that the Bible is fallible, that reason can make a man a representative Christian as well as the scriptures, and that when our Lord taught a certain doctrine of the Old Testament he taught what was not true, and when he quoted writings as being by Moses he did not know what he was doing, but merely adopted mistaken popular opinion."

While the East has been edified by the acquittal of Professor Briggs—an acquittal which practically nullifies the creed of Presbyterianism—the Middle states have been grieved by the conviction for heresy of Professor Smith—a conviction which has worked something like a boomerang, for the executive committee of the board of trustees of Lane Theological Seminary have given Professor Smith notice that he will be expected to retain his chair in the seminary in spite of the action of the presbytery, and Professor Roberts, who was active in the prosecution of the "heretic," has been informed that his resignation at the end of the year would be acceptable. Truly these be queer times among the brethren.

Acknowledgment.

Not being able physically to write, nor financially to hire others to write, letters of grateful acknowledgment to the friends who are helping us out of our most unpleasant situation by increasing the number of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we have this week printed a large number of their letters. It will be noticed that these epistles are short, but they are just as the friends wrote them—barring personal allusions. Short as they are, they are mighty pointed and tell a tale as well as any poet could tell it, sweetest of singers though he be. This added number of readers means that Freethought is going to be known in scores of places hitherto dead in their superstition, and we believe that the good effects will be apparent. And we hope to put THE TRUTH SEEKER permanently into a great many other hands, and shall be able to do it with the assistance of our good friends. A great number of names have been sent us and to all of them we shall send copies of the paper. We hope some of them will subscribe, but feel morally sure that some stagnant thoughts will be set circulating.

We have also to thank our old and true friend Alexander Cochran for a gift of $6.50—balance of a ten-dollar check. Also Mr. H. L. Wright, who sent a dollar to help along. Also Captain Silas Latham, of the Nutmeg state, who is of the salt of the earth as well as a salt of the sea. Every time the Gertrude Summers gets in from the South with a few thousand bluefish stowed away in the hold Captain Latham comes up and tells us where he caught them, and before she unmoors he drops in to get some books to read when his anchor is down, the Summers head on to a big sea, and the spray flying over her so that "on deck" is like being under a shower-bath. The captain never goes outdoors when it rains, he says. He sailed from this port last week, making his usual call here for good luck—and he is the luckiest, or the keenest, fisherman of the fleet—and when he went away he left a "little something to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER afloat," as he put it—twenty-five good dollars and two years' subscription. May the bluefish swarm merrily around every hook from the Summers—may ice be cheap and the bluefish heavy, and never a sheet or halliard part on any schooner he owns. May the winds blow from the north when he wants to go south, and hard from the south when his bowsprit points this way. May topsail breezes and schools of fish attend him ever!

And W. K. Blodgett sent seventy cents more than the books he ordered came to, and Jacob Josephs made it a dollar. Mr. N. C. Creede, vice-president of the Amethyst Mining Co., writes:

"DEAR BROTHER IN THE FAITH: Have just finished reading 'Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated,' sent me by you recently, and outside of the Amethyst mine think it the richest thing I have struck for many years; will send it to Brother Talmage. And now I want another, to wit: 'The Freethinker's Pictorial Textbook,' bound in silk cloth, ink and gold side stamps, price $2.50. Inclosed find ten dollars—$2.50 will buy the book. Keep the remainder, $7.50, for your own use; it is not much, but will help to buy the babies (in case you have any) a bowl of bread and milk. Yours out of Christ."

Fearless Samos Parsons, eighty-nine years of age, mourning the recent long separation from his helpmate, and listening to the rustle of the wing which love hears, sends us ten dollars as our share of the two hundred dollars he has distributed among the active workers for the cause he loves. He also uses the opportunity to read us a little lecture for our various shortcomings—which his years and good works amply entitle him to do—although he is wrong, as a matter of course.

To all of these, and to all of those who have written us ordering books and renewing subscriptions, we return our thanks and a New Year's wish for their continued prosperity and good health.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to have at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselves of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

The Disruptive Influence of Religion.

Among the manifold evil effects of religion, one is its tendency to hostile nation against nation, and one part of a nation against another part. During past ages religion continually bred war of one nation on another and of one section of a nation on the rest. No agency has been more potent in raising those national differences and prejudices which yet keep the Old-World nations in their costly and brutalizing war posture.

We will here give some instances of religious antipathies struggling to disrupt nations at the present day, and failing to do so only because of the strenuous counteraction of government.

Germany yields one example. The struggle there between Catholics and Protestants is bitter, and the news comes:

"The religious antagonisms reawakened in Prussia will be found to have stimulated the growth of particularist, and perhaps even secessionist, sentiment in the South German states."

From India we receive this communication, by way of Col. F. Hilder, formerly of the British army there:

"It is an open secret, one which the natives themselves are by no means slow to admit, that the moment the strong hand of England was removed the old feud between the Mohammedans and Hindoos would break out in terrible force."

In Ireland Catholics and Protestants have been fighting from time out of mind. The Protestants of Ulster province, being in the minority, are piteously pleading that Home Rule be not granted. They know that an Irish parliament at Dublin would make short work of them. The Catholics assume the same indignation when accused by the Ulsterites of tyrannical intentions that they do when charged by us with past crimes and present eagerness to commit more. They declare themselves pitifully aggrieved and outrageously insulted by the assertion that their gaining control would plunge Ireland in "disorder, violence, and bloodshed."

Samuel P. Putnam will deliver the Paine anniversary oration on the 29th for the Liberal League of Philadelphia. It is probable that the battle with Congress for the opening or closing on Sunday of the World's Fair will be over by that time, and Mr. Putnam will again be in the lecture field. In the mean time he will accept calls to lecture in places within a short ride from Washington. Address him at 1,325 G street N.W., Washington, D. C.

There seems to be more trouble in store for Christ Schweinfurth, ex-Methodist preacher, and present dupe of religious idiots. Mr. James O'Gilvie, who has spent a year at the "Heaven," is on the warpath, having fallen from grace, and now threatens to expose Schweinfurth. O'Gilvie came from Canada with his wife two years ago and took up his abode at the famous Schweinfurth heaven. When he joined the colony he turned over all his possessions, about $4,000, to Schweinfurth, and he has now placed the case in the hands of an attorney for collection. Life at "Heaven" was not as full of delight for the old man as he had hoped, and he promises, whether Schweinfurth settles or not, that he will turn the eyes of the public to the way in which things are done at this famous place. Mrs.

O'Gilvie has not lost her infatuation, and refuses to leave with her husband.

The "restoration" of Dr. McGlynn may not be so complete as reported. The church desires the impression to prevail that Mr. McGlynn has taken it all back, and the priest would have people believe that he has taken back nothing, but that "the church" has been with him all the time, and that it was only the men then in power he was opposing. The restoration, consequently, is limping along till the pride of one or the other of the parties suffers a collapse. But however it turns out, the attempt to get Dr. McGlynn back is a weakening on the part of the church. The excommunicated priest had a following, and they were gradually drifting away from Rome, helped along by the spirit of independence which people will acquire in this country in spite of theological fetters. The church was weak enough to want them to return to the fold, and evidently has made concessions. It is a good sign that the people are gaining strength and the church is losing it.

Sidney H. Morse writes in the Conservator: "Ingersoll has had great audiences here in Chicago for his lectures on 'Voltaire' and 'Miracles and Myths.' It can't be all eloquence or curiosity that draws the multitude. It may be said of him also 'The people hear him gladly.' They see his points and applaud without reservation. The query is, Who are all these people, and where do they come from? One does not see many faces from the Unitarian churches there—more, perhaps, from the Ethical Society. But, all told—empty all the Liberal churches and Ethical people in Chicago into McVicker's Theater, and they would no more than fill the gallery. The great body of Ingersollians are from the outside somewhere. And a very intelligent, well-clad crowd it is. The same was true at Duluth a year ago—a large theater crowded from floor to ceiling—sitting or standing there over two hours to hear him discourse on 'Shakspeare,' and taking great care to applaud all his religiously heretical talk. It means somewhat. The Unitarians generally speak of Ingersoll as lacking in culture, not up in all the later biblical criticisms. All of which may or may not be true without much affecting the common sense of the man. The time will probably come when all this fine 'criticism' will carry little weight anywhere. People will live from the facts, experiences, insights of to-day—knowing quite as well as the ancients what each moment or emergency calls for or demands. All those old 'inspirations' were born of a genius that yet clings to human nature, and provides men and women more and more with a ready, opportune wit and wisdom, so that they speak and act from themselves, rather than from hearsay or tradition. It is a part of the democratic urge that is so conspicuously liberating the nations and endowing individuals with reason and vim. Mangasarian's 'Luther and Ingersoll,' the other Sunday, was a poor interpretation of the latter, describing Ingersoll's work as wholly negative—a denial, and not an affirmation, of truths or virtues. The speaker did not heed his own saying that 'one must first comprehend another's thought before he can criticize it.'"

Notes About Books and Other Things.

Dentist Caleb Weeks has reduced the price of his books. "Human Life" is now one dollar; "Selections from the Poets, with Responses," one dollar; and "Songs of the Morning," seventy-five cents. The doctor's friends will appreciate his sacrifice.

We shall soon have ready a new edition of "Liberty in Literature," Colonel Ingersoll's address at the Testimonial of Walt Whitman, delivered in Philadelphia, October 21, 1891, to which we have added the oration at the funeral of Whitman, in Camden, in March, 1892. This is the first time this latter oration has been put in permanent form, and adds value to the other, completing Colonel Ingersoll's tender estimate of the people's poet.

Mr. B. O. Fenton, the indefatigable reader, of Bundysburg, Ohio, writes of Keeler's "Short History of the Bible." "This is certainly one of the greatest productions of the age. Short but unanswerable are the arguments that it contains, highly indorsed by 'Bob.' Every Freethinker ought to have ten copies and lend nine and thoroughly study the other one. He clearly proves the growth of the Bible, and backs his arguments up by the highest authority."

We have purchased the plates of W. S. Bell's "Handbook of Freethought," as well as the remainder of his stock, and they are now on the way across the continent. We shall be glad to get orders for the book again, having been out of them for some time, and when those are gone we shall print a new edition. It is too valuable a book to lie on publishers' shelves. The price is $1.25.

We are glad to see that Mr. Eckler is pleased, testimony to which effect is found in the subjoined letter:

"New York, Jan. 5, 1893.
"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I am pleased to learn that Mr. Geo. E. Macdonald, 'a distant brother of the Editor,' and my old friend, is again to become a contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER. His writings were always popular and interesting; and the sooner he commences to write, and the oftener he sends his communications, the better for the Freethought cause and for the enjoyment of your readers.
"Yours truly, P. ECKLER."

A book that we think Liberals will find of great value and usefulness is one just published out West. It is written by James B. Alexander, and the title is "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind." It is an attempt, as the author modestly puts it, to construct a system of rationalism in harmony with science. It is, however, quite as useful for its condensation and plain stating of what evolution has taught us, and the authorities cited by the author are all acknowledged as leaders. We shall soon publish an extended review of the work, by a competent philosopher. The work is large, as it must necessarily be to cover even partially such an extensive field, and the price is consequently $2.75. We have ordered quite a number of them, because we think it a work worth circulating.

Science and Progress.

Russian Caesarism.

The Russian empire at present claims 117,000,000 inhabitants, and since the beginning of this century the territory subject to the sway of the hideous despotism has increased at the average yearly rate of 22,000 square miles. The system of espionage and government interference with personal rights is also getting worse from year to year, but the Christian hypocrites of the Old World have, after all, no right to complain. The Roman world-empire, with its worship of joy and free circus games in the paradise of southern Europe, was not moral enough for them; their Holy Alliance combined against the heir of the French Revolution and made him expiate his reform plans on the rock of St. Helena. They have now to submit to a knout-revival of Caesarism in the frozen deserts of the North.

An Eastward Exodus.

The cholera blockade has depressed the rate of immigration one-third below its usual average, but that decrease does not appear to affect the equanimity of our passenger-agents any more than the delay in the expected Chicago boom. They probably foresee a chance to recoup themselves next March by the Eastward rush of meritorious office-seekers and Christian crank reformers. The Sabbath-law saints have already begun to forge signatures for their proposed monster petition.

Jesuit Pets.

Guzman Blanco, who knew Jesuit morals from personal experience, described the South American mission Indians as "creatures whose vices degrade them much lower beneath the level of beasthood than their degree of intelligence can be said to raise them above that rank."

Cause and Effect.

The darkies of northwestern Kentucky are indulging in a revival resembling the ghost-dance craze of the Sioux Indians. In the larger cities their meetings are protracted till long after midnight and are being watched by the local police. The result is an unusual stringency of the poultry market.

Christian Ethics.

Thomas of Aquina, a model saint of the Christian church and quoted by numerous popes as a chief exemplar of the faith, holds that "farmers and mechanics are too much engaged in worldly pursuits to have a claim to enjoy the full rights of citizenship." As a rule he objects to the selling and buying of human chattels, but remarks that if slaves are kept it is good policy to select those of strong body and weak mind (mente deficientes), and get them, if possible, from foreign countries, to lessen their chance of exciting successful insurrection against the authority of their masters.

Monk Literature.

Rohrbacher, in his Histoire de l'Eglise Catholique, states that the monks of the Franciscan convents were instructed to scratch their ears like dogs whenever they felt disposed to intimate a hankering for a peep at a pagan author (such curs as Virgil and Plato being now and then admitted to the files of their libraries); and the canons of criticism held by their modern successors are well characterized in an orthodox almanac published at Donauworth, Germany. The editor of that edifying periodical calls the philosopher Lessing a "shameless thief," and the poet Goethe a "sneaking egotist, who was directly responsible for the early death of his rival, Schiller."

Fashions in Pets.

The fashions of the dry-goods market appear to become international much quicker than those in dogmas or dogs. The pot-bellied pug-dogs that have multiplied so rapidly in the United States were discarded in Europe long ago, so thoroughly, indeed, that in Austria and France the breed has become almost extinct. In Vienna they have been superseded by black poodles and in Paris by Italian greyhounds, while the Russians, like their Prussian neighbors, delight in canine Jumbos, St. Bernards, and Danish mastiffs. At the beginning of this century, spaniels were all the rage, but the undeniable beauty of the King Charles breed could not compete with the grotesque ugliness and cunning tricks of the Scotch terrier.

Grease Vs. Prayer.

The steamer Umbria, after a week's battle with storms much worse than those encountered by the Spree, has reached port without the assistance of any prayer experts whatever, by the prosaic device of plastering her ice-clogged machinery with a triple dose of axle-grease.

Post-Mortem Troubles.

The cremation controversy ought to be decided by the fact that the frequency of grave robberies has almost doubled in the course of the last ten years. A stoneware urn, with a handful of ashes, would be tolerably safe against the greediest burglar, but the churchyard hyenas appear to defy private vigilance committees as successfully as the public guardians of the law.

A Martyr of Freethought.

A Valparaiso firm has published a volume of "Memoirs and Correspondence" of the late Manuel Balmaceda, who, judging from the changed tone of the Chilean press, stands a fair chance of being canonized as a martyr of patriotism. Patrick Egan, with all his political sins, is unquestionably a shrewd observer, and there seems no doubt that the leader of the South American Liberals fell a victim to the intrigues of the church party. His reforms extended to every branch of industrial and administrative concerns, but he was guilty of the never-pardoned sin of having attempted to emancipate education from the control of the clergy. Personally he was a radical Freethinker. "Our chief advantage" (in Chili), he once told a representative of the Lima press, "is the neighborhood of the Patagonian snow-fields, for it seems that the fury of bigotry cools as we approach the poles on either hemisphere. Valparaiso, New York, and San Francisco are safe enough, but Lima and New Orleans have to be on their guard against revivals of hierarchy." Near his Valdivia summer-home he had made the acquaintance of an American family whose youngest son accompanied him on all his rambles, but declined repeated invitations to follow his patron to St. Iago. Among the papers captured by the commissioners of the victorious Junta there was a note to that summer friend—twelve words, written on a large envelope, in tolerably orthographic English: "My dear little Diogenes, I step out of your sunlight. Good-bye."

Tricky Gnomes.

The priests of the south European mining districts managed to impress their parishioners with the belief that the hobgoblins of the mountains would hide their treasures in the most secret places unless their evil influence had been counteracted by well-paid prayers. On our own side of the Atlantic the neglect of that precaution seems to have led to similar results. The California bonanzas had eluded the pioneers for two hundred years and ceased almost completely as soon as the Transcontinental railroad had crossed the Sierra Nevada. The Black Hills boom, too, lasted only while the auriferous district had to be reached by a wagon journey across vast stretches of intervening deserts. The latest Eldorado almost defies the competition of Eastern treasure-hunters. With the sole exception of central Alaska the new gold-placers of the San Juan district are located in the most inaccessible region of our national territory—the bleak tableland of southern Utah, swept by blizzards in winter and by sandstorms in summer, and as poor in water and timber as the Staked Plains of western Texas.

Microscopic Problems.

The traveler Wartegg observes that weak eyes do not afflict the population of our Western states near as much as the composite population of the East—the state of New York, for instance, where he claims to have seen twelve spectacled guests at one dinner-table. The eminent ethnologist must have attended a Brooklyn church fair banquet, with the usual menu of delicacies invisible to the naked eye.

F. L. OSWALD.

CATHOLICS and Protestants hailed alike the great work of Delrio. In this the power of devils over the elements is proved first by the holy scriptures, since, he declares, "they show that Satan brought fire down from heaven to consume the servants and flocks of Job, and that he stirred up a violent wind, which overwhelmed in ruin the sons and daughters of Job at their feasting;" next, Delrio insists on the agreement of all the orthodox fathers that it was the devil himself that did this, and attention is called to the fact that the hail with which the Egyptians were punished is expressly declared in holy scripture to have been brought by the evil angels. Citing from the Apocalypse, he points to the four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, holding back the winds and preventing their doing great damage to mortals; and he dwells especially upon the fact that the devil is called by the Apostle a "prince of the power of the air." He then goes on to cite the great fathers of the church, Clement, Jerome, Augustine, and Thomas Aquinas.—Ex-President White of Cornell University.

Hostess: "What has become of Sandy Smith, who stood so high in your class?"

Alumnus: "Oh, he's taken orders."

Hostess: "He's in the ministry then?"

Alumnus: "No; in a restaurant."

Popular Delusions.

An eloquent lecture on this subject was recently delivered in our town by that zealous champion of orthodoxy, Hon. George R. Wendling, who, according to his own statement on the platform, has uttered the same opinions before very large and highly delighted audiences in many cities, including, I think, New York. It is well worth while to know what people like to hear, and how far it is good and true. Such a vigorous denunciation of the practice of urging one's own election to office is certainly a public benefit; for it is only those who work disinterestedly who can keep politics pure. I also agree cordially with the lecturer's denial of the value of merely emotional religion, and with his affirmation of the unequaled superiority of the present age, not only in physical vigor but in moral elevation. His tribute to modern philanthropy dwelt very properly upon the emancipation of women, as well as on the cessation of hanging and burning witches.

It is rather queer, though, for a man who delights in this progress, to deny any intellectual superiority of the present age to the past. He did admit that the steam-engine, the telegraph, and one or two other recent inventions, were worth mentioning; but he insisted that, in other respects, our intellectual superiority to the past is merely that there are more of us who know, but not that any one of us knows more. Among the subjects about which he said that nothing has been found out during this century was the origin of the colors of flowers. I should not have supposed that even a popular lecturer could be so utterly ignorant of Darwin's works. It was equally refreshing to hear that substantially everything which has yet been discovered about mathematics is inscribed on a stone, about twenty inches long by ten wide, carved in ancient Nineveh. This, of course, is the same stone spoken of in the famous lecture on "The Lost Arts" by Wendell Phillips; but he merely speaks of it as "containing an entire treatise on mathematics." It looks as if all that was known about mathematics then could be told briefly. I was not surprised at the repetition of the statement by Phillips that Nero used an opera-glass; but it was rather startling to be told, as we were the other night, that not only the principles of hygiene were fully understood by the ancient Hebrews, but also the art of war. Here I suspect that the eloquent lecturer had a grateful remembrance of the mighty deeds achieved by Samson with a jawbone like that still in use.

Ridicule of a speaker who tries to make his audience put science down among popular delusions is perfectly just. Better men than he take the same ground that science is merely an aid to useful inventions but no guide to truth. The great conflict of the age is between scientific and theological methods of thought. Every reader of this journal knows which it was that abolished punishment for witchcraft. The lecturer I criticize said this great reform was not due to Rationalism but to a revival of interest in the gospels. He could not have mentioned any books which did so much to strengthen belief in witchcraft by teaching the kindred fancy of possession by Satan. The atrocities at Salem were largely due to the ministers; clergymen held firmly to the reality of witchcraft after educated laymen had given it up; and among its latest advocates was that mighty champion of gospel Christianity, Wesley. This century is philanthropic, because it knows better than any of its predecessors how to put kind feelings into practice. It is the best proof of our intellectual superiority that we know so much more than our ancestors about the rights of women, the claims upon us of the insane, the limits of just punishment of crime, the proper treatment of criminals, the duties of man to man. Much of this precious knowledge was given us by Bentham, Mill, and other Rationalists.

The value of the light recently thrown by science upon the history of our planet, including the process by which the various races of plants, animals, and especially men, have developed, ought to be plain enough to every educated man. The discovery by Huxley, Pasteur, and other living investigators of the potency of germs is of particular importance in three directions. It has led to the invention of the canning process, now so widely used by housekeepers and professional packers, to the great increase of comfort and improvement of health in all civilized lands. It has reduced the danger of blood-poisoning in surgical operations so much as to save a countless number of lives which must otherwise have been lost. It has taught physicians how to check the spread of consumption, hydrophobia, and other deadly diseases.

Much might also be said about recent discoveries in chemistry, and other practical departments of science. The highest truth is valuable for its own sake; and no book ever written has, I think, done so much to enlarge this most precious of all our possessions as the "Principles of Psychology," in which Herbert Spencer showed what is the origin and authority of conscience and the other intuitions.

There are, of course, many conflicting opinions about the value, in all respects, of the work done by Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, and their co-workers; but there ought to be only one opinion about the justice of ignoring that work in a lecture about the intellectual character of the present age. If I fee a lawyer for his opinion about my legal rights and privileges, but find out that he has paid so little attention to recent statutes and decisions as to make his opinion worthless, I have a right to think I have been swindled. If I buy a book just published as an account of recent discoveries in Africa, and find that the writer has taken no notice of Stanley, or any other explorer during the last fifty years, I can complain justly that I have been imposed upon. What else can I say of a lecturer who comes out of the shadow of a great library to make large sums of money by telling to one big audience after another, a story which has been prepared so hastily and with such a plain desire to make a sensation rather than to tell the truth as to give a thoroughly false idea of our intellectual privileges and duties? Have I no right to require of a man who takes money from me and my neighbors for showing us a picture of the age in which we live that he should at least take ordinary care to make his picture tolerably accurate? Is it right that a lecture should be at the same time so plausible and so erroneous as to tempt the hearer to say that its title ought to run thus, "Popular Delusions, by One of Them?"

McGlynn's Worthlessness.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Dr. McGlynn, the poor Jesuit priest that was excommunicated by Archbishop Corrigan two years ago, has been ever since cringing and fawning to be restored again to favor with the bishops and priests, and has at last succeeded, by the power of the pope, delegated to his holiness Monsignor Satolli to settle the case.

That Father McGlynn never was sincere and honest in all his remarks about the pope and the bishops and priests in his discourses delivered in the Cooper Institute and other places through the country is well considered. He touched on the course of Rome very gingerly on all occasions. People said: He will be back in the church of Rome before long. "That great toe of the pontiff Leo XIII. is destined to be kissed." Protestants knowing the prevarication, deceit, and intrigue practiced by the church of Rome put but little faith in all the pretense of Father McGlynn.

On his ordination he swore to support the pope in all matters of religion emanating from his holiness. Right or wrong, implicit obedience is demanded. "I," says the pope, "am God's viceroy on earth, and have the keys of heaven and hell. Whatever I lock up is locked up, and whatever I choose to loose is loosed, and there is no use trying to get around it. Have I not the key dangling in front of me with a chain about my neck as a warning to the faithful and a terror to the timid and disobedient?"

'Tis true that in the sixteenth century Pope Paul refused to grant the request of a Spanish knight, Ignatius Loyola, for a religious order, until he proposed that, besides the three vows of poverty, chastity, and monastic obedience, his society should take a fourth vow of obedience to the pope, binding themselves to go whithersoever he should command for the service of religion and without requiring anything for their support.

Paul granted the most ample privilege to the members by a bull, and appointed Loyola to be the first general of the order. Before the expiration of the sixteenth century they had obtained the chief direction of the education of youth in every Catholic country in Europe, as they are now striving to gain the ascendancy in this beloved land of ours. Witness with what assiduity and perseverance they continue to agitate our free school system.

Poor Father McGlynn. He is to be pitied. He has lost many friends who were in favor of his previous determination not to be humbugged by an order from a presumptuous Irish bishop. But now he is like "the dog that returned to his vomit"—pat him on the head and say, "Poor doggy, poor fellow," and he will lick the hand that smote him.

Dr. McGlynn has actually declined to say anything on the subject. If he was an honest, fearless man he would stand erect and cry out, "Liberty of thought and action in all matters of religion!" and not succumb to tyrannic power.

By what right does this Italian pope have power to send his legate, Satolli, as representative to America to settle any matter over which our government has control? The sending of Satolli is an assumption of power that the American people should not tolerate for a moment. Suppose the Protestant churches should send a delegation to Great Britain to adjust the system of public-school education in that kingdom. Does anyone need to be told what a Tory or Liberal would have to say of such impertinence? Are our people to govern themselves or are they to take law from the Vatican?

Patrick Corrigan, of Hoboken, N. J., who was indicted by the bishops of the Catholic church for sentiments expressed by him on the school question, has repented of all that his reasoning mind had previously affirmed to be true, thus: "I now take it all back and will never again make another attack on Bishop Corrigan or Bishop Wigger, and pray both of you to overlook it." There you have the Jesuitical power in a nutshell.

For the good of Holy Mother Church those proceedings must be kept secret—not be known to the common people. That is the policy of the church of Rome.

They cannot, dare not, have an independent mind of their own. Pope Pius XIII. has them all, soul and body, under his control. They do not dare to do otherwise, for fear of excommunication. Poor, blind leaders of the blind, in fear of the tortures of purgatory! They will never listen to reason until they without prejudice read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." Enough of reason at times has been said to enlist the inquiring mind and drive superstition out of the head. But, alas, how lonely does it sound! Since writing the above Dr. McGlynn addressed the Anti-poverty people in Cooper Union hall, where he extolled the mission of Archbishop Satolli to this country, and said, "I sincerely rejoice over what has happened, and still more what is portending. I rejoice because of my love for the Catholic religion, both spiritual and temporal." He said the clergy seemed to feel that America had no religion except such as was brought over by foreigners. They looked upon it as a misfortune that a man should be born an American. Great Scott! Holy Moses! what have we come to? During his discourse some one in the audience cried out, "How about the reconciliation?" McGlynn paid no attention to it. Again came the voice, "How about the restoration?" He was dumb as an oyster to the question and went on speaking louder. "We Americans," said he, "thought we knew it all, and now Archbishop Satolli, that good man, comes from Rome to teach us something." Now the great question is, where are we now?

The Protestant churches appear to be dead to the matter that is going on in the Roman Catholic church. They appear to be absorbed in Professor Briggs's Infidelity, and about Moses, whether he or somebody else wrote Genesis and the other books attributed to him. As also the middle state after death. What nonsense to bother about that which no man or woman can know.

The only true mind is the Freethinker. He has Reason to guide him, not superstition and bigotry, which is nothing more than presuming to know something about the unknowable.

Professor Townsend, of Boston University, last week had independence of mind to assert that "a Jesuit Inquisition sits at the elbow of every editor and reporter in Boston." "The aim of the Catholic church," he said, "is to suppress free thought, silence free speech, and extinguish the intellect. Should Cleveland appoint a Roman Catholic postmaster-general, that official, under Cardinal Gibbons, would not allow a book or tract containing criticisms of the Roman Catholic church to pass through the posts."

If that is so, then we will have a fight. I want to be here to see. It will be "Johnny get your little gun."

Since writing the above the Jesuit priest has been restored to full communion with the church, and celebrated mass on Christmas day in one of the Brooklyn churches. In the evening he had a high old time at Cooper Union before an audience of Anti-poverty seekers. He had nothing to say about the restoration of himself to the priesthood.

He forgot all he had previously said about his being excommunicated by that old woman, as he called the pope, and said: "I would be burnt at the stake before I would retract one word I have said about the ownership of land," which was one of the offenses against the teachings of the church while under the ban of excommunication.

He had said: "I defy the malignity of Rome. I give them warning now, that if they attempt to hound me with the arts of which they are such masters, I will expose them. I have only told things which politicians and well-informed people have known in the past. But I give them warning that I am full of knowledge of events the tale of which will make the country too hot to hold them. They had better let me alone." What do you think of that? There was an admission, and for fear of exposure the Jesuit priest has been restored by the Old Woman at Rome.

Some of his followers look upon the Jesuit priest as if he had gained a great triumph over his superiors, while Freethinkers look upon him as a sneaking, cringing coward, full of hypocrisy and deceit.

Poor McGlynn is now back safe under the protection of the church of Rome, but he will have to do penance for his sin against the superstition of the mother church. Oh, what fools these Christians are!

He will have to take back all he said in the Anti-poverty Society. What humility from a man who professes to have, and boasts of, liberty to think and act.

When Dr. McGlynn was excommunicated two years ago, the Protestants thought he would throw off the mask of Rome and come out on the Protestant side, and they encouraged him and spoke fairly of him and sought his friendship; but the power of the Vatican was too strong for him. He wanted to taste again the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament. Deluded mortal! But he had his wish gratified last Sunday in offering mass. I detest the whole thing and I don't care who knows it.

S. R. THORNE.

The Cause in Washington.

The following extract from the Tacoma News tells its own story:

The Tacoma Ministerial Alliance at its meeting this morning considered the question of gambling in this city. The action of the Secularists and their insistence on the exclusion of all recognition of God in the form of religious exercises in the public schools received rebuke. Revs. W. C. Stuart, D.D., of Sumner; W. H. Atkinson, of Lake Park, and H. Schucknecht are the committee of correspondence with other religious bodies in the state to secure a consensus of sentiment on the subject of taxing the property of school, church, and eleemosynary institutions, and to secure if possible exemption of the same from the burdensomeness of taxation.

This is a subtle scheme to create sympathy by falsehood thinly covered.

They declare they seek passage of a law to save them from the burdensomeness of taxation on their charitable institutions. Under the existing law all church property is exempt from taxation to an amount not to exceed $5,000.

"Hospital for the care of the sick, whether supported in whole or in part by charity." This means that all the immense buildings, and acres of adjoining land called garden—held for raise of value—shall be exempt from taxation, because in a little dark corner of the attic, or basement, there is one narrow iron cot, called the charity bed. This is enough to comply with the law. The institution is partly sustained by charity, so is exempt from all taxation.

"Orphanages and orphan asylums, institutions for the reformation of fallen women, and homes for the aged and infirm," are exempt from all taxation.

Yet the various Ministerial Alliances throughout the state are banded together to demand more. By bribery and intimidation they expect to secure legislation which shall justify them in their infamous extortions and theft of public money to sustain Christian institutions, compelling those opposed to pay for their support.

Their purpose is plainly declared. What shall be the action of the Liberals of Washington to counteract their nefarious designs?

The executive committee of the Washington Secular Union recommend:

Distribution throughout the state of the pamphlet against exemption from taxation of church property, so the people can be thoroughly posted on the injustice and iniquity of exemption.

The writing of a personal letter to representatives at Olympia by every Liberal of the state, urging complete divorce of church and state, the abolition of all exemptions of church property or church institutions from taxation.

Contributions, to the extent of their ability, by all the Liberals of the state toward the fund to keep at Olympia during the next session of the legislature able representatives of the Washington Secular Union to work for the repeal of all laws exempting church property or church institutions from taxation; and to vigilantly watch that no underhand scheme, or sudden or hurried passage of an iniquitous law, be rushed through under the influence of the Ministerial Alliances.

Unity, persistence, and a little self-sacrifice will keep the state of Washington in her proud preeminence as the banner state for Liberalism.

Immediate responses by payment of dues and remittance of contributions to the Washington Secular Union will insure defeat of the combined Ministerial Alliances and victory for right and justice.

News and Notes.

The following clipping shows the drift of events and the issue of the future:

PIITTSBURGH, Pa., Jan. 3.—A call has been issued for men and women to meet at 163 Fourth avenue next Monday afternoon to form a new political party. The call says:

"Recognizing almighty God as the author of civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ the ruler of nations, and the Bible the standard to which all human action should conform, and that all our people are entitled to equal rights, without respect to race, color, or sex.

"We hereby unite in calling a conference of all persons who will join in a political party for the abolition or suppression of the drink traffic in the United States, and for such other moral, economic, financial, and industrial reforms as are needed in the country."

Arrangements will then be made to hold a convention for western Pennsylvania in February. The call for the new party is the result of five hundred signatures of prominent men and women who desire a unification of interest from adherents of other parties on the Prohibition and equal suffrage platform. The nominee for the presidential chair of the new party, it was stated, would undoubtedly be Miss Frances Willard. The promoters of the new party are sanguine of success.

The Freethought Federation was organized none too soon. The question is forced upon the American people publicly: Shall this be a Christian state or secular state? Shall it be freedom or slavery, the Dark Ages or civilization?

I have received this message from a Western comrade:

Well, since you were here I have lost a brother. He left here without saying good-bye. After a few weeks he wrote: "I cannot feel toward you as I would if you were a Christian man, for, as you must know, by turning away from the teachings of your mother and allying yourself with scoffers of the religion of Christ you have alienated yourself from companionship with your brothers. We are Christian men and our families are Christian families, and we will not have your unbelief spread out before us. You must see this yourself, that while you persist in being as you are it cannot possibly be congenial. You bar yourself from all good society. I wish, oh, how I wish, it could be otherwise, but this most assuredly I do not look for, so I suppose it will have to continue through life. I know very well and have often noticed that you are generous in very many ways, but this can never bridge the gulf that lies between us, when we know that you openly scoff at and despise our Jesus upon whom alone our hopes of heaven depend."

No wonder that Jesus said, "I came not to bring peace on earth, but a sword." Such is the religion that would enthrone itself in this republic. Such is the religion that closes the World's Fair on Sunday. Such is the religion that has made more blood and horror in the pages of human history than all other forces combined.

The movement for the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday is moving amidst rocks and shoals. The way before it is full of peril, and defeat threatens. The sentiment in favor of opening is largely on the increase, but the organized power is not with it. It has to struggle merely as a sentiment, the political force is lacking. The committee on Columbian Exposition are one majority in favor of a resolution in favor of Sunday opening. A canvass of the House gives about two majority in favor of closing. Still I have no doubt if a day could be set apart by the House for a fair discussion of this question, and popular opinion be allowed its legitimate influence, as represented by petitions with nearly a million names, that the proposition to open on Sunday would carry by a good majority. The Senate is pretty evenly divided, but if the resolution passed the House by fifty majority, it would I think pass the Senate. If, however, it passed the House by a small majority, its fate in the Senate would be extremely doubtful, and it is pretty certain that if it did pass the Senate by a vote or two, the president would damn it with a veto. To secure the signature of the president there must be a large majority in both houses for the resolution.

But the orthodox bigots have the inside track. So far they have the legislation on their side. They are entrenched; are on the defensive, and as such can resort to dilatory tactics. Possession is nine points of law. The orthodox hold the winning card up to date. All that the orthodox have to do is to keep things intact, and every cowardly Congressman who does not want to be put on record will join them in this policy.

It is extremely doubtful if Congress with its enormous rush of business, together with the cunning diplomacy of the orthodox, will allow any time to be given to the debate of the resolution, even if reported by the committee.

If the same sentiment and expression and organization of Liberal sentiment had existed at the time of the vote to close last session, as exist now, the restriction would never have passed. But Liberals were careless; they let the thing go by default and as a consequence the orthodox forged ahead, and the work we have to do now is tenfold increased. We are not simply to overcome an adverse majority, but we have got to fight even for a chance to bring the matter to a vote. The policy of the church party is, to delay, and delay is fatal to the hopes of the Liberal party.

If we could only have a "field day" in the House we could win, but the orthodox will try and prevent that. They have all to lose and nothing to gain by further action. It would be seen that the Liberal party needs not only push, but a deal of patience, and the most skillful tactics of war. It will require keen parliamentary maneuvering to bring the question of Sunday opening before the House for a decision this winter. How sharply we learn the lesson in this case that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Leave Sunday Opening to God.

It seems that the question of closing the gates on Sunday at the World's Fair is not satisfactorily settled, and many ways and plans are proposed by many who are interested for and against its closing. Those who want the Fair to be made as much a success as possible, insist that the gates of admission be open seven days in the week, that all who want to see the Exhibition on Sunday and cannot see it on any other day, can do so, and that by so doing many will be accommodated, and the benefits of the Fair will be greatly enlarged, and no harm will be done to anyone.

Those who insist that the gates be closed one-seventh part of the time do it on the ground that it is a violation of the Lord's command to keep holy and sacred the Sabbath day, and that it is on God's account, not theirs, that they want to injure the success of the occasion by the shutting up of the greatest, most interesting event the world ever had.

Now, as I understand things, I think the only and best way to settle this thing is to leave the whole thing to the parties most interested in this matter, and they are "the Lord of the Sabbath," and the World's Fair commissioners. And to come at the thing, have those commissioners say to the Lord, they wish to act in good faith in this matter toward him as well as all others, and wish to know of him what is his mind as to closing the Fair on Sundays; that they are willing to be governed by his desires; are willing to shut up the Fair Sundays if he so desires—that all they want is to know his mind. That if he wants the gates closed Sundays, he is to make it known by some sign in the heavens or on earth, so that the commissioners and all others can be satisfied it is the will of the Lord of the Sabbath the gates of the Fair be closed Sundays during its continuance; and if he make it sufficiently understood that such is his mind, such will be done and no complaint will be made by those who wish to witness the Fair on Sunday, all will be satisfied, and all will be quiet on that day.

Have a day set by the commission when the Lord will answer this request, and if he wants the gates shut he certainly will be present. He used to do so very often in Bible times, and he can do so now as he did in times without number.

Let the Lord make known his pleasure in any way he sees fit, only have it in a clear manner so there can be no mistake, and it will be as evident as it was when the prophet Elijah asked of the Lord to rain down fire and he did.

Christian people ought to unite with the commission in this arrangement, and pray to God to be on hand at the time set. Should he say, "Shut up the Fair on my holy Sabbath day," it would be the best thing for him he ever did as far as promoting the observance of the Sabbath is concerned, and people who believe in him will never be sorry the thing was settled in this way.

I know of no better way to dispose of this vexing question than this way. The plainer the sign, the more satisfactory will it be to all. The commission will see to the preliminaries, and the Christian community ought to comply with some such arrangement.

CARLTON RICE.

An Open Letter.

TO THE REV. CHAS. AUGUSTUS BRIGGS, New York City, Dear Sir: Believing that you are one of the "elect" to rule in the domain of Reason, I submit the following questions to your consideration, trusting to your sincerity to favor us with a reply:

1. How can a conversion of sinners to your faith affect the future destiny of those who are pre-ordained to everlasting hell-fire, or debarred from entering the kingdom of heaven?
2. What difference can it make to those who are predestined to be saved whether they listen to your sermons every Sunday or enjoy themselves elsewhere?
3. Is it not in direct contravention of the almighty's will for you to endeavor to save those whom he has destined to be damned? Are you not thereby antagonizing his dictates?
4. Do your constant revisions of the Bible and of your Confession of Faith not prove that the Bible is the product of fallible man? How dare you tamper with or revise God's word?

5. Do you not by these revisions virtually constitute yourself the arbiter of the future destiny of your fellow-beings, thus arrogating to yourself rights that are the exclusiv prerogative of your divine master?

6. Is the salvation of billions of souls whose fate depends upon your present construction of the Bible not again jeopardized by your next meddling with the "word of God?"

7. Does each revision not produce a corresponding change in the preordained destiny of the individual?

8. If a human parent consigned his children to pain untold would you not regard him as a veritable monster? Then why should a heavenly father who predestines his offspring to everlasting tortures not be held in the same execration?

9. How can the rite of baptism alter the fate of a dying infant that is predestined to eternal damnation?

10. How do you reconcile your ideas of justice with your belief in infant damnation whether the child is baptized or not?

11. How do you reconcile your ideas of justice with anyone being damned when it is in the power of an omnipotent and merciful being to save him by the mere fiat of his will?

12. Seeing that the revisions of all Christian religions have a tendency to gradually abolish such an abominable creed, why not throw the whole superstition overboard at once and "done with it?" To use a common similitude: If the dog's tail has to go, why not cut it off at once rather than only a small piece at a time?

Respectfully yours, HERMAN WETTSTEIN.

SECOND DAY'S MEETING, OCTOBER 13TH.

The president of this day's meeting was Mr. Leon Furnemont.

The secretary, Mr. Odon de Buen, after having read the minutes of the previous meeting, announced to those present the death of a delegate of Carlet, citizen Gensotru. The president spoke the words of regret and pronounced a eulogy over our departed brother.

The congress decided that secular funerals are the proper thing, and a delegation appeared later for the special committee and asked that the exhortation to perform such ceremony be recorded in the minutes and urged upon the different nations.

The secretary announced a large number of adherents to the congress received since the day previous.

Citizen Magalhais Lima said: "Over our congress presides the spirit of Victor Hugo; let us therefore render homage to France, the classical land of Freethought. I propose that we send a telegram of sympathy to Auguste Vacquerie, and one of condolence to the widow of Ernest Renan." (Great applause.)

Citizen Odon de Buen paid a warm tribute to the memory of César de Pape, which was much applauded.

Citizen Ramon Chiés moved that the proposition of Magalhais Lima be adopted. This was done unanimously and by acclamation.

Next the discussion of Question 8 began.

INFLUENCE OF THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA ON THE EMANCIPATION OF THOUGHT.

Citizen Simon Chaux (Republic of Columbia) brought forward a series of historical facts which since the discovery of America had brought about the evolution of Freethought in the New World.

Citizen Fernando Lozano (Demofilo) said: To appreciate the participation of the church in the discovery of America at its true value, it will not do to regard the results as the product of an ingenious conception of Columbus, but as a result of human work in the field of science, even if the mariner from Genoa has to suffer.

The work of Columbus is incontestably the work of science, which had established the globular shape of the earth, and the art of navigation. If the creation and development of science was due to the church, it would be the same church which to a great extent would profit by the glory of having discovered America.

But the church, far from being a contributor to science, has at all times opposed rational investigations, has opposed the proclamation of truths which human intelligence has arrived at, has formulated.

Demofilo gave then numerous historical proofs of this assertion, and especially called attention to the persecution of both temporal and spiritual powers which characterized the Middle Ages, and even later centuries.

On the contrary, the science of theology is the science of the Bible, which considers the earth as a plane (although the globular shape is proved), because the fathers of the church, ignorant of the law of gravitation, insisted that it was absurd to suppose the existence of the antipodes.

The later saintly church fathers affirmed and sustained the belief that the earth is flat, since if it was spherical the people on the antipodes would be walking about on their heads with their feet extended into the air. (Laughter.)

The discovery of America is the realization of an epoch in the Renaissance, and a legitimate child of the Renaissance. If it had been a work of Christianity it would have taken place in the fifth century, and if it had been a child of Catholicism it would have been realized in the twelfth century.

What part can the church have in a work which is the product of scientific labor performed by philosophers, astronomers, and physicists whom she anathematized, excommunicated, and burnt?

The one who sustained Columbus was a heretic, like Galileo, like him who headed the English Revolution, like the Puritans in the United States—heretical like the authors of scientific transformation in Germany, like the participants in the great French Revolution, and like this assembly, which represents a universal coalition the sum of which is to call to order, to settle, the royal scepters and the popes. (Prolonged and enthusiastic applause as citizen Lozano (Demofilo) left the platform after his eloquent discourse.)

The discussion which followed was on the subjects 3 and 4.

3. THE INCOMPATIBILITY OF CATHOLICISM AND MODERN LIFE.

Citizen Enrique Roger, delegate from Merida, said: Religion and science are two absolutely opposed spheres, are antithetical elements. Science is a volcano of resplendent light which illuminates the mysteries of life. Her spirit is reason; her tendency the elevation and dignification of man. Religion is an accumulation of darkness which smothers all by its weight; faith is its soul, the strangulation of the free expression of thought its tendency. How can we bring about a conciliation of these opposed terms? How unite science and religion, reason and faith, the free expression of conscience and the petrification of the mind?

This tendency of Freethought is admirably embodied in the democracy and in the republic.

Democracy is liberty, she is equality, she is brotherhood, and reason is the liberty of science, the inspiration in art, in morality, and in law. And it is in vain for one to oppose the victorious march of modern life. See, the ghosts, the monsters, the thrones, the Vaticans, shake on their foundation. Behold, the dust rises over their remains. The democracy is the evangelism of modern times.

Religion divides people into classes; science makes brothers. Religion offers to those who suffer here a future eternal life of pleasures; science seeks to transform the earth, to-day sterile and miserable, into a paradise of indescribable splendor.

The struggle is eternal. Let us fight for emancipation of conscience, and proclaim as immortal and eternal the sublime tendencies of the democracy. (Acclamation.)

4. THE MOST EFFICACIOUS MEANS TO PURIFY MODERN LIFE FROM THE CATHOLIC VIRUS.

Citizen Bourceret, as delegate for the French Freethought Federation, expressed on its behalf his thanks and recognition of the tribute paid by the congress to the memory of Victor Hugo, and Ernest Renan, and for the communication sent to the Rappel.

He affirmed that the church is not alone incompatible with liberty, equality, and brotherhood, which constitute the basis of modern life, but also, as a consequence, with mankind individually.

The Catholic religion, he said, is founded on pretended truths which have not been and cannot be demonstrated, and as a consequence she is incompatible with the life of our times, which adheres to and depends upon positive science, not alone the demonstrative but also the experimental.

Headed that the sphere in which the pretended movements of religion take place is the spiritual life, the life of the soul. But before examining if religion really moves in this sphere, we must inquire into what we mean by the term soul, to see whether this idea corresponds to reality.

To this end citizen Bourceret began a minute and curious psychological analysis, at the close of which he arrived at the conclusion that the idea of the existence of the soul is an innocent confusion with the idea of the psychological activity of man, which is the result of the pure materialistic organism of man.

In place of this, religion, although it limits itself in the direction of the spiritual, tries to caress the senses with the ceremonies of an exterior worship, cultus, appealing at the same time to the sentiments, and in this underhand way dulls reason, the sole empire of which is lost in modern society.

Speaking of the incompatibility between state and church, he declared that the unique form of government of modern times is the republic, and demonstrated the opposition which exists between a republican form of government and that of the church.

Speaking of France, he said that there were certain timid spirits who feared that a separation of church and state would bring about a destruction of the republic, but it is certain that the republic and Catholicism are united simply by the law.

In constitutional states also the incompatibility between the two institutions manifests itself, because said states represent the transition between the government which founded its power on divine law, and the republic, where it is derived directly from the people.

Citizen Moreno Barcia, principal of the commercial school in La Carogne, and delegate for the Free-thinkers of this city, spoke about the baneful influence of the Jesuits—how they entered the family and by influencing its female members produced domestic strife and misery. He furthermore pointed out the incompatibility of Catholicism with economic and domestic life, and thereby with the tendencies of present times. He concluded by complimenting the foreign delegates.

Citizen Francois Rodriguez, delegate from Murcia, was the next speaker. He began by stating that on this occasion he was not brought face to face with an intransmutable audience, because he beheld here a congress of Freethinkers—that is to say, one of progress and tolerance. In eloquent words he attacked the fanaticism found in all faiths as opposed to progress.

In Greece Socrates is the victim of polytheistic fanaticism, the same which in Rome persecuted the Stoics. A man appears, born in Galilee, and belonging to the sect of Essenes; he preaches liberty, but the Jews destroy his temple, he is crucified, and another drama of religious intolerance is at an end.

Christianity is triumphant, and although the voice of liberty is heard in Rome, intolerance arrives, seeks out another prey: Abelard is the victim of fanaticism.

In the name of religious intolerance Spain has poured over Flanders a sea of blood.

Protestantism, which reformed the church in the name of tolerance, which has made love to tolerance itself, has numerous victims, among these Michael Servetus, who died at the Golgotha of science.

All religions have preached tolerance, but science alone is capable of reigning impartially. Therefore instruct, teach the nations.

The speech of citizen Rodriguez received a thundering applause.

Citizen Ruiz, delegate from the Anarchist groups of Madrid, declared himself not to have come as an Anarchist but as a Freethinker, and asked the audience to consider him and his brethren as "true soldiers of reason and Freethought." (Applause.)

Citizen Tarrens, representative of the Socialists of Barcelona, reported to the congress the adhesion of the greater part of the workingmen of the second, or long the first, city of Spain. He said that Freethinkers were the only sincere friends of the working class.

It is impossible to harmonize Catholicism with Socialism; the former regards work as a punishment, a degradation, while the latter regards it as the first natural and social condition.

The priests who pass their time in distributing benedictions are useless members of society. Their constant cry of poverty is contradicted by the splendor of their cathedrals and convents, erected by hard-earned pennies wrenched by threats and extortions from the people. (Ovation.)

The workingman is not the master of the machine, he is the slave.

This very energetic and at the same time learned speech was vigorously applauded by the audience, which nearly filled the large hall, and numbered several thousand persons.

A large number of ladies in elegant toilets were present on this as on the preceding day.

Citizen Jean Dons, delegate from Belgium, delivered an eloquent speech, in which he proved the incompatibility of Catholicism with a republican as well as a monarchical state. He was vigorously applauded.

After a few eloquent remarks of the president, the second day's meeting came to an end amid a great enthusiasm, and cries of "Long live the republic!" "Long may Freethought live!"

ALFRED H. GRALL.

FREDONIA, N. Y., Nov. 8, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: I durst not withhold my subscription for fear that it might cause THE TRUTH SEEKER to relax its grip it now has on Old Superstition in the same proportion. As we become more and more united our grip is firmer and the breath of Superstition grows shorter and weaker. We will fight it out on this line if it takes a lifetime. What say you?

PLINY SMITH.

OLATHE, KAN., Dec. 16, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for the following order: Your paper for one year to me, a new subscriber, $3; "Force and Matter," by Dr. L. Büchner, $1.50; "Age of Reason," by T. HOWICK, QUE., Dec. 27, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: My subscription expires with the year, and as I expect to continue to live next year I must renew. Inclosed is $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1 a present to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 50 cents for a book as per inclosed clipping. Keep the remaining 50 cents to my credit. I will order extra copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER when certain letters appear in it.
Yours, CHAS. LAPERCHE.

VINELAND, N. J., Dec. 30, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you $5 to pay for your paper from Jan. 1, 1893, to Jan. 1, 1895. I have taken it from its first number, and the Boston Investigator for near fifty years, and expect to while I live. If you do not hear from me before the time paid for expires, please stop my paper then, for I am almost eighty-three and may pass in my checks before that time, though I hope to circulate more tracts and books before leaving for good. Accept my best wishes.
J. S. SHEPARD.

ELLWOOD, N. J., Nov. 23, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed express money order for $1.20 for the following matter: THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, commencing with the first November number, 75 cents; "What Must We Do To Be Saved?" by Ingersoll, 25 cents; "Christianity a Reward for Crime," by O. B. Whitford, M.D., 10 cents; "Why Don't He Lend a Hand, and Other Agnostic Poems," by S. P. Putnam, 10 cents. Also please send list of all your reading-matter. Please send as soon as possible and oblige,
WILLIAM W. MILLARD.

GALVESTON, TEX., Dec. 22, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: Having had strange and peculiar views concerning religion, and happening to meet a gentleman who was a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I borrowed a few copies, and was very fairly pleased, as I found a good many ideas and items in it which were a good deal to my own way of thinking—although I had never read any work which conflicted with religion. So I herewith inclose $3, for which you will please send one year's subscription. Also, find $2 for which you will send the following pamphlets.
JOHN J. RAPHAEL.

GARRETTSVILLE, O., Dec. 30, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I should have renewed before this date, but have been fishing for subscribers, throwing out TRUTH SEEKERS for bait. I guess they like the bait, but few ever come back to me. I was quite sure of one, but when I pulled in the line the bait was gone and not a damned fish on the hook. I am almost eighty-four years old, and realize that I am failing physically and mentally; still I intend to fish on, hoping to yet pull some up into clearer water.
Yours for truth and justice,
A. C. LAKE.

BARRE, MASS., Dec. 23, 1892.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50 for renewal of my paper for 1893, and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." I have read every number of your paper since its first four issues—nineteen years—and do not intend to give it up while you are "death on" Catholicism, the Bible in the schools, Sunday closing of the Exposition, to say nothing of the numerous other bad things you condemn and good things you advocate.
I rejoice that the "Holy Bible Abridged" is in such good demand, for all who read its "sacred pages" will be convinced that it is the filthiest book in existence—though every word in it is Bible—and because it is an easy reference for all the obscene passages in "God's most holy word."

ELLA E. GIBSON.

TAPPAN, O., Nov. 11, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I have neither religion nor politics. And before I vote for Ingersoll I would like him or some one to explain the difference between tithes and tariff. I claim that tariff is only another name for tithes. Tithes reduced Italy to a crank-organ and Germany to a mouth-organ, and tariffs reduced England to a hovel of paupers and a House of Lords, and reduced America to a nation of tramps and a mansion of devils. I would as lief be ruled by the king's club as ruined by the president's bayonet. I would as soon be Jeff Davis's negro as Pierce's bloodhound, Lincoln's bulldog, or Grant's yellow pup. I would rather pay tithes, tenths, to a priest's God, than tariff, fifty per cent, to a politician's devil.

Inclosed find $5, for which date my tab two years forward.

SIMON SMITH.

HOLLYWOOD, KAN., Dec. 29, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $5. Please send your paper for one year, commencing with the first number in January. Also send "Men, Women, and Gods," and the Bible Picture Book. I have read a few copies of your paper and I think it is a wonderful eye-opener. Long may it live. Your paper was shown to me by John P. Durr, one of your subscribers, and one of the most free-minded men in America, who is in possession of a Bible which is a hundred and fifty-three years old and was translated by Dr. Martin Luther. Why are they changing the Bible? Mr. Durr and I are trying to do something toward Freethought. We need your support, hence our subscription. We are the only two outspoken Freethinkers here among the Catholics, German Lutherans, Baptists, and Methodists. You will hear from us again.

Awaiting your paper, I am,

Yours truly, J. A. PAULL.

OSWEGO, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I many, many times get mad at the damned cowardly Freethinkers of Oswego. Last winter I tried hard to raise interest enough to have Mr. John E. Remsburg lecture here, but I could not. But this winter I think I am sure of him. I have far more encouragement. If I was not pluck to the last drop I should get discouraged and drop the fight. I am disgusted with Freethinkers of Oswego, and thousands all over the country. There are many books you advertise I want, but I cannot spare the price of them. If there is any other man in Oswego that takes your paper I wish I had his name. I would call on him. There are more than twenty professing Infidels here, and some of them are very rich. They should help more. I many times wonder why the workers do not get discouraged and stop work. I know I should if it were not for educating myself. I have done my best in trying to get up a literary club, but "no go."

JASPER J. BROWN.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: A few weeks since one of the friends put forth the idea that it would be a good thing to build a monument in honor of Colonel Ingersoll while he was still living. I second the motion, but the best monument that can be built in his honor need not be either stone or bronze, but a determination on the part of each of us that we will do all we possibly can to support the Liberal papers now in existence and assist the lecturers now in the field. The Secular Union, the Freethought Federation, to have Sunday-schools for the young wherever it is possible, and endeavor to the utmost extent of our power to draw out the social and sympathetic feelings which should form a part of the religion of humanity. This action on the part of each of us will be the best monument that can be erected in honor of Colonel Ingersoll, and he will be enabled while he lives to see that his words have not been in vain, but have aroused the reason and excited the enthusiasm of men and women.

RUTH BRETTELL.

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ., Dec. 28, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I send you $10 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, also to pay for four new subscribers to the same. I might add that I find among the business men and best-educated people of this town a very strong tendency toward Freethought and most Liberal and enlightened ideas. Witches, Holy Ghosts, Gods, and devils evidently have long since been to them a thing of the past, but policy, seemingly another kind of ignorance, prevents these powerful minds from expressing their true thoughts to the public and subscribing for THE TRUTH SEEKER. May the time soon come, however, when this great curse to humanity, superstition, will find its ranks weakened by educating and training the people to reasonable, sensible, and true ideas until every priest will have become ashamed of his calling or be compelled to seek more fertile fields to reap a harvest to support himself and a great portion of his dupes in idleness, is the wish of

Yours truly, C. A. NICHOLS.

CANTREL, IA., Dec. 21, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I send you to-day $2.50 for a book entitled "Antiquity Unveiled." Price, $1.50. The other $1 to go on my subscription. This is a hard town on belief. You have to believe what those ministers preach or else go to hell. The Campbellites and Methodists have been holding forth for three weeks. The Methodists have quit with three additions to the church, but the Campbellites are still going for the water. They put me in mind of beavers. You know that they build their huts under water and of course have to enter the door in the hut under water. Alas, the Campbellites have to follow suit, or lose a trick. It is to my mind absurd to think that God is good to all alike here on this earth but as quick as the breath leaves you turns against you just because you did not give one of his agents your hand and say "My redeemer liveth."

One of my good Christian friends asked me the other day why I did not become a Christian. I told him in politics I was a Republican, and when it came to God and religion I was a Granger. "Why," says he, "how is that?" "Why," says I, "it is this way—what little business I have with God I will attend to myself." He put off. He has not spoken to me since.

Yours always, ALEX. FIX.

CRAWFORD, MICH., Dec. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Please send your paper to the following address for one year. Inclosed find $3 in payment of the same. I am a new subscriber. Please state through the columns of your paper what the Secular Union is doing in the interest of Liberty, as I am unable to learn through the secular press, your paper, or the Sentinel, that they have done anything. We have an organized foe in every church organization—in every Women's Temperance Union, and every Young Men's Christian Association and Sabbath-school Union. Our foes are using these organizations for the purpose of suppressing the Liberty of thought, the liberty of conscience, the liberty of speech, and the liberty of the press. And while they are organized, the Liberals, as far as I can learn, are wholly unorganized. Can we expect to cope with an organized foe while we the Liberals act singly all over the land? There are many Atheists and Liberals all over this section of the country, but many of them are poor and unable to pay $3 a year for a paper. They are all asking us to wake up, but was there ever an army, a successful one, without a leader and thorough organization? Now, I have reason to believe there are more Liberals in the land than there are church tyrants, and would it not be well to form organizations in every city, town, village, and hamlet, and thereby be in shape to speak to our legislators, our Congressmen, and our Senate, and make it impossible for such things as Parkhurst and his inquisitors to exist? Poor as we are, I believe we might maintain a reasonable number of lectures if we were properly organized, and also a number of Liberal papers. Or is there no patriotism, no love of liberty, in Liberalism? If there is not, let us seek safety under the cloak of churchism before the storm arrives. I am an old man and nearly bedridden.

WILLIAM C. DECKER.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 23, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: J. D. Fulton preached in Music Hall, Boston, Sunday, December 4th, on "The Good and Bad in Colonel Ingersoll's Work." He said: "Ingersoll's description of the Inquisition ought to be studied by the people that seem bent on glorifying Romanism. His description of Romanism as Voltaire knew and fought it is matchless. I suppose if there is one thing Ingersoll would dislike to do, it is to help God, and yet for some inexplicable reason he has said the worst and truest things against Romanism of any one of the century. It is not unlikely he has done this that he might strike the religion of Christ under pretense of assaulting superstition." Such an acknowledgment of good is worse than the bad can be, as no pretense was needed, Fulton and the pope both living on the sweat of superstition.

Yes; superstition is the Christian Yahoo's curse. That strips the flock to cram the parson's purse.

Fulton said the Chicago Tribune did not publish that Voltaire fell in love and to the girl he wrote: "Do not expose yourself to the fury of your mother. You know what she is capable of. You have experienced it too well. Tell her you have forgotten me; then after telling her that, love me all the more." Fulton said: "In this utterance, Colonel Ingersoll says, we find the keynote of the character of Voltaire; and he, the son of a Presbyterian minister, went from New York to Chicago to praise a liar and to find fault with ministers for not doing the same. Christianity makes men tell the truth if they suffer for it." Does Fulton travel all over the country to praise a liar? Paul is reported to have said (Rom. iii, 7): "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory why yet am I also adjudged a sinner?" Was Paul a liar?

Acts xxi. 39.

Paul said, I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city.

Acts xxii. 27.

Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea.

Hudibras said:

For the saints may do the same thing by The spirit in sincerity, Which other men are tempted to, And at the devil's instance do; And yet the actions be contrary, Just as the saints, and wicked very.

THE TRUTH SEEKER began the year with a new dress and a more modern make-up, although in sore need of money due on subscriptions. Has the change improved the financial standing of THE TRUTH SEEKER? In every other respect it is first-class. You have assumed the responsibility of the "business end," and the old stale problem confronts you yet—how to get an honest dollar out of so-called Liberals. Thanksgiving has passed, and what did you have to be thankful for? Certainly not for those overdue subscriptions from "Liberals," as the editorial of the first TRUTH SEEKER after Thanksgiving showed. Harrison's message said God stayed the cholera—perhaps he kept Liberals from meeting an honest obligation to an honest paper. The last paper says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER has received so little money during the past summer that the large bills referred to have accumulated, and the persons to whom we owe them want their money." If those "Liberal" subscribers have any of the milk of human kindness it is not unreasonable to infer that many of them could relieve your troubles by being good to themselves on the plan advised by the best life insurance companies:

The price each day of a single beer Will pay insurance through the year; And one cigar a day the less Insures your life and happiness.

Inclosed find $7 to renew my subscription till Jan. 1, 1894, also Henry Willard's to the same date, and $1 to help the "business end."

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

CROOKSTON, MINN., Jan. 2, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: John R. Charlesworth has come and gone, and while he was here we had a lively time. Mr. Charlesworth is a most eloquent and forcible speaker, but as a debater he surpasses himself. The second evening he lectured here the Baptist sky-pilot at this place, the man of God who is conceded the ablest and best talker of all the divines in the whole city, came up with the Bible under his arm, and when the lecture was over he was filled with the Holy Ghost and showed fight at once. In the course of his remarks the man of God claimed that the Bible was the infallible word of God, and that it was the purest, the holiest, and the most sublime book that ever could be revealed to man, and that no book has yet been found that can compare with it. He urged upon all to take the Bible and read it from end to end. And as a most conclusive argument he claimed that nobody could limit God almighty.

To this Mr. Charlesworth answered that he would join with the reverend gentleman in urging everybody to take the Bible and read it from end to end, as there was no book he knew of that would make so many Freethinkers as this very book. It was for a great part the meanest and the most obscene book ever printed. It was too obscene to be read aloud in an assembly of decent people, and he defied the reverend gentleman to open the Bible he held under his arm and read Gen. xxxviii to the audience without the blush of shame overmantling his face. As to limiting God almighty, he asked the man of God if God could make a clock strike less than one, if he could make a two-year-old colt in a day, if he could make a body that he could not himself lift, and a number of other questions. The sky-pilot got confused. He did not dare read Gen. xxxviii, and in his dilemma he turned pale as a sheet. After a few minutes of trembling and despair he gathered himself up again, and with the assistance of Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost he opened his Bible and found a place where the Holy Ghost himself had treated such offensive questioners. He proclaimed that God did not care about wise men after the flesh, and that the Holy Ghost had answered those that would search into and question the mysteries of God with "Thou fool!" Having pronounced his "Thou fool!" this disciple and witness of Christ took to his hat and went for the door. Mr. Charlesworth asked him to wait, as it would not require more than five minutes to reply to him, and he would better stay and listen to it. No, the Christly man could not wait, he had some appointments to fill and he had to go. Seeing there was no use in arguing on this point, Mr. Charlesworth started at once with his reply, and to the surprise of the audience the reverend gentleman stopped and listened to it.

In substance Charlesworth said: If God did not care about wise men after the flesh, why did he make them? According to the Bible Christ himself said that "Who-soever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire," and if Christ, therefore, is to be relied on, the Holy Ghost too is in danger of hell-fire.

The discussion lasted about one hour, and I never saw a man collapse so wretchedly as this preacher did. Armed with the Bible as he was, and filled with the Holy Ghost and faith in Jesus Christ as he claimed, it availed nothing. The little giant of Freethought routed him on every point and put him to an ignominious flight. Trembling and pale he gave up the discussion, and when the meeting was over and ladies and gentlemen wanted to pass out the minister was so confused that he did not notice he stood right in the doorway and obstructed the passage, and his attention had to be called to it three or four times before he became aware of the fact. Then he was in no hurry to fill his talked-of appointments. On the contrary, he stood by the door and tried to distribute some tracts to the passers-by, so he was of the last ones to leave the hall, thereby convincing everyone present that his appointments were a lie; so he succeeded nicely in adding to his utter defeat a willful priestly falsehood. Thus this meeting served wonderfully to open the eyes of many about these holy impostors and heavenly vipers.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Bells of the New Year.

How the mellow bells peal to-night!
Their echoes sound so dear
To the patient watchman yonder,
As he records the dying year.

The great white brow how wrinkled
With toil and care and strife—
Would you know his age and name?
'Tis Time; the dispenser of life.

See! the aged hand is writing
The accomplishments of man.
Above the eons of ages past
Is inscribed—"He who can."

Oh, ye weary bells, toll on!
Awakening memory so dear.
'Tis the close of Time's short day,
'Tis the close of man's long year.

One sharp peal, my ear it thrills,
Echoes dying at midnight day,
Like the notes of a joyful June,
O'er the meadows far away.

Then comes piping forth a lay
Of hopeful joy so full and clear,
In memory of long years past,
Joyful notes of a glad new year.

Time, looking up so wearily,
Turns the immortal pages o'er,
"No rest here for a sage like me, Toil on, toil on for ages more."

Again, upon the new-born page
His glorious record to scan,
Wrinkled Time patiently writes
The noblest deeds of man.

Canon City, Col.

O'RELLA LOCKE.

Mounds in Cowley County, Kan.

Mounds are numerous in Cowley county. The most important of these is located on a hill on the Wright farm just north of Arkansas City. This mound is probably the largest ever discovered in the state. It is about two hundred feet in diameter at the base and about twenty-five feet in height. It is quite conical in shape. At each cardinal point on the sides of the mound is a stone slab, each slab being of a different color. No attempt to open it has been made except by two students, who undertook to tunnel through it from side to side. After working half a day and finding the earth fairly baked, they abandoned the work. One of these students relates that when a small boy he took occasion to visit the mound quite often for the purpose of throwing the peculiar stones that were found on its summit, as these stones were just the right size to throw. This is singular, for nowhere else in the surrounding country could similar stones be found. Unfortunately, however, all these have fallen prey to the schoolboy's sport. The young man who related the above is very honest and his word is not to be questioned. A great many shell beads and large quantities of ore blossom have been found on the mound, the latter having probably been carried there from the mountains.

Dr. James Young, an archeologist from Ohio, while visiting in Arkansas City several years ago, observed a number of mounds along the Arkansas and Walnut rivers. There are also several south of town on the opposite side of the river, and still more just east of town on Grouse creek. None of these mounds have ever been disturbed, except two on Walnut river, which were opened by Mr. Reinsch. They contained nothing but pottery fragments, flint chips, charcoal, bones, and arrow-points. These mounds were about thirty feet in diameter and were originally between three and four feet in height. Mr. Reinsch found a hollowed mortar, or grinding-stone, in the vicinity of these mounds. It is made from whitish limestone.

Just south of Maple City there are some mounds which, from all appearances, were opened many years ago and the contents taken, except once in a while an arrow-point is found in the dirt that was thrown out. Large trees are now growing on this dirt. Old settlers are inclined to believe that the mounds were opened by the early Jesuits or their followers.

Chats With Correspondents.

SHEARLOTT M. H., ARIZONA.—Your interesting article will appear soon. Be patient. Always glad to hear from you.

JOHN D.—Do not be discouraged. This world is improving all the time. As the boy said when asked if he did not want to go to heaven, "No, Detroit is good enough for me." So we can make this world good enough for anybody to live in. When all have plenty of wholesome food, warm clothes, comfortable shelter, and can live in peace with each other, then there will be an approach toward a very good sort of heaven on earth.

GEO. J. REMSBURG.—Thanks for kind congratulations, and your interest in the Corner. We are pleased always to note your progress, and congratulate you on your responsible position on the staff of the Champion. We have prophesied that your qualities of mind are calculated to bring you to distinction and success. Be careful of your physical health, as so much in life depends upon a sound physical foundation.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

WOODLAND, MO., Dec. 24, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the first time I have written to the Corner. I am a boy eleven years old, and I live on a farm in Missouri. My father takes the paper and I like to read the Children's Corner. I go to school every day. I study grammar, arithmetic, and geography. I guess I will close. Wishing good luck to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Your friend,

DELBERT SEAR.

[We hope this will not be the last letter from our friend. Study hard and learn all you can. Education is better than gold.—ED. C. C.]

ATCHISON, KAN., Dec. 18, 1892.

MISS WIXON, Kind Friend and Teacher: I see by the papers that you have been reelected a member of the Fall River school board, and I wish to extend to you my heartiest congratulations.

I inclose a short article descriptive of the mounds in Cowley county, Kan., thinking it would be of interest to some of the readers of the Corner. I notice that a number of our Corner friends are interested in archeology.

I wish I could get time to write to you and the Corner friends more often, but I am working on the Daily Champion here as assistant city editor, and consequently am kept very busy. Nevertheless, I have not lost interest in the Corner, and never will. With best wishes,

Your sincere friend,
GEO. J. REMSBURG.

TURNER, ORE., Dec. 22, 1892.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: I thought I would write to the Corner again.

We are having our first snowstorm. I want to run and play and wallow in the snow, but I guess I had better not.

We have flowers in bloom out of doors, if they are all covered with snow.

There is going to be a Christmas tree in the Baptist church here; also a dance in the Masons' Hall on Friday before Christmas.

There are not any outspoken Free-thinkers in Turner but my papa and mamma. We take the only TRUTH SEEKER that is taken in Turner. There was a protracted meeting going on in the Methodist Episcopal church across the street. They have been going on with their meetings for nearly three weeks, but finally stopped, with but two souls or souls saved.

Wishing you all a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year,

I remain truly yours,
KATIE D. MATTESON.

[Very glad to hear from Katie once more.—ED. C. C.]

HECTOR, ARK., Dec. 18, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As my education is quite light, the readers of this piece need not expect to catch any new words, or to get an over-gorge of information. I like to read the Children's Corner, and after so long a time have concluded to add one to your number of writers.

My father has taken the dear old TRUTH SEEKER for fourteen years, and he could no more do without it than a preacher could do without telling a lie. The saints (?) had a big hallelujah time at this place last summer, and about ninety-five said by their actions that they were tired of sin. Their sins were washed off in a small creek near by, washing down against a water-gap, tearing it loose.

I guess the little preacher John Williams imagines himself almost as great as Sam Jones, the saint (?).

The preacher says he is coming up this week to spoil our Christmas for us with his heavenly cries. If he should come to meddle with our innocent sport, and the waste was not too great, the boys ought to bedabble his suit.

I was out yesterday to the young people's prayer-meeting, and heard the doleful old tunes which always bring the juice from a believer's eye, and cause the corners of his mouth to drop down and the skin to wrinkle across his face.

I will turn the string loose for this time, as I must go on to school. When I get my head filled up I will write again. Hoping this will miss the waste-basket, I remain—
Yours for Freethought,

JNO. B. HALE.

JERVISPORT, KY., Dec. 22, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I want to write to you a conversation I had with a Roman Catholic friend. I handed him a sermon, or letter, delivered in New York by H. O. Pentecost, on "An English Monk," then in New York preaching to save souls and collecting money for the ministry in Wales. My friend said, "You read, I will listen." He said, "That lecture is all right." He then said: "Mr. Smith, I have heard you talk your religion ever since I was a boy. I then thought your ideas were good; now I know it. But you are the only one on earth I would say so to."

"Why so, my friend?" "Because if I were to tell a Protestant he would make capital out of it for his religion. If I were to tell a Catholic my wife might hear it, and if I were to die before her the priests would mob her and our children and take what we have worked hard for." This good man was brought up in a creed. He is all his life a prisoner. Will God thank him for being a slave? Is it not a fact that his country needs all the best things he can do for her? Afterward I asked why he had not made an effort to free his wife and children. He said: "My dear sir, you can't understand my troubles—a priest coming around—I could not afford to cross my wife, the mother of my children. If I ever could it is too late now." My friend was raised a slave. How many are in the same boat!

I think it was Mr. Paine who said, "Time, opportunity, and the ambition of some and the weakness of others do everything in this world." My friend did not take time by the forelock. Now he can not. Good fellow, but I cannot help him.

GEORGE SMITH.

NORTH HYDE PARK, VT., Dec. 24, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have been a reader of the Children's Corner for some time, and have enjoyed it very much, especially your article "Across the Atlantic."

My uncle takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and he and my father value it very highly.

I am now attending the Johnson Normal School, about five miles from this town.

During the past week, a Baptist preacher, by the name of MacGeorge, has been holding meetings at Johnson. There was a great excitement, and a great many people, including nearly all of the students, went "to Christ."

In the course of his talks Mr. MacGeorge said a great deal against Infidels, and Mr. Ingersoll especially. He made one statement of which I am rather doubtful. It was to this effect, as I understand it. Mr. Ingersoll was to debate with a preacher, and just as the time came when the talk was to begin, Mr. Ingersoll got so intoxicated that it was several days before the debate could go on. He also affirmed that Mr. Ingersoll was beaten.

I did not hear the gentleman say this, but it was told me by a young lady who heard him say it.

Will you please tell me if Mr. Ingersoll is a man of intemperate habits?

Hoping to hear from you soon, I am,
Yours truly, BERYL HARRINGTON.

[Revival ministers generally carry about so many falsehoods as part of their stock in trade. Little dogs bay at the moon. The ignorant and narrow-minded are apt to attack the noble and good whose opinions differ from their own. The beloved leader of Freethought, Colonel Ingersoll, is not a man of intemperate habits, and it is well known that he never was and never can be beaten in any religious debate. He is as a star in the sky compared to the little tallow-candle of a minister who spends his time spreading falsehoods and declaiming against his superiors.—ED. C. C.]

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 33 pages. This is, beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly colored, and richly tinted, the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published works, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother, E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fiske, Elizabeth Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," "Love, Liberty, Art and Morality," "Science, Nature, The Imagination, Decoration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny," "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

Prices.—In cloth, beveled boards, gilt edges, $2.50; in half morocco, gilt edges, $3; in half calf, mottled edges, library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible finish, $8.

Any of the above sent to any address, by express, prepaid, or mail, post free, on receipt of price. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

Life of Thomas Paine,

WITH A

History of His Literary, Political, and Religious Career in America, France, and England.

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY,

Author of "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," "George Washington and Mount Vernon," "Washington's Rules of Civility," etc.

To Which is added a Sketch of Paine by William Cobbett.

No real biography of Paine has ever appeared. The so-called Lives of Paine have been mainly the controversial work of pamphleteers, turning chiefly on his religious heresies. Paine was in his fifty-eighth year before he published anything concerning religion, and before that time he had acted an important part in revolutionary movements in the United States, England, and France. But in the religious conflict initiated by him, his political services and military career have been but inadequately considered. A certain historical ostracism has buried in the archives of various countries a large mass of documents containing records of paramount interest and importance. Mr. Conway has personally searched such records, in Europe and America, and has obtained from these fresh light, not only on Paine, but on various eminent figures in American and European history with whom he was associated. A large amount of unpublished correspondence has been included in the volumes.

Mr. Conway says in his Preface: "In the laborious work of searching out the real Paine I have found a general appreciation of its importance, and it will be seen in the following pages that generous assistance has been rendered by English clergymen, by official persons in Europe and America, by persons of all beliefs and no beliefs. In no instance have I been impeded by any prejudice, religious or political. The curators of archives, private collectors, owners of important documents bearing on the subject, have welcomed my effort to bring the truth to light."

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.

In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

Gems of Thought.

VICE is sufficient of itself to make a man thoroughly unhappy.—Aristotle.

Of two evils we should not only choose the least, but endeavor still to derive some advantage out of that.—Cicero.

You show by the character of Gusman [in a play] that Christianity, ill understood and guided by false zeal, renders men more barbarous and more cruel than paganism itself.—Letter of Frederick the Great to Voltaire.

GENIUS makes for itself a path where no one went before; it pursues its course without guide, without art, without rule; it goes astray in its career, but it leaves behind all excellence that is merely reasonable and correct.—Voltaire.

An ignorant people take instinctively to the severer modes of religion, as they do to the severer schools of law and physic. They like their medicine, whether for mind or body, exceedingly nauseous and painful. They love the terrors of the law.—Parton.

VOLTAIRE examined the Bible for himself, advocated intellectual liberty, struck from the brain the fetters of an arrogant faith, assisted the weak, cried out against the torture of man, appealed to reason, endeavored to establish universal toleration, succored the indigent, and defended the oppressed.—Ingersoll.

We check and repress the divinity that stirs within us to fall down and worship the divinity that is dead without us. I go to see many a good man or good woman, so called, and utter freely that thought which alone it was given me to utter, but there was a man who lived a long, long time ago, and his name was Moses, and another whose name was Christ, and if your thought does not, or does not appear to, coincide with what they said, the good man or good woman has no ears to hear you. They think they love God! It is only his old clothes, which they make scarecrows for the children. When will they come nearer to God than in these very children? A man lately preached here against the abuse of the Sabbath, and recommended to walk in the fields and dance on that day. Good advice enough, which may take effect after a while. But with the mass of men, the reason is convinced long before the life is. They may see the church and the Sabbath to be false, but nothing else to be true.—Thoreau.

THE results of the working out of the agnostic principle will vary according to individual knowledge and capacity, and according to the general condition of science. That which is unproved to-day may be proved by the help of new discoveries to-morrow. The only negative fixed points will be those negations which flow from the demonstrable limitations of our faculties. And the only obligation accepted is to have the mind always open to conviction. Agnostics who never fail in carrying out their principles are, I am afraid, as rare as other people of whom the same consistency can be truthfully predicated. But, if you were to meet with such a phenix and to tell him that you had discovered that two and two make five, he would patiently ask you to state your reasons for that conviction, and express his readiness to agree with you if he found them satisfactory. The apostolic injunction to "suffer fools gladly" should be the rule of life of a true Agnostic. I am deeply conscious how far I myself fall short of this ideal, but it is my personal conception of what Agnostics ought to be.—Huxley.

THE Pennsylvania Magazine, in the time that Paine edited it, was a seed-bag from which the sower scattered the seeds of great reforms, ripening with the progress of civilization. Through the more popular press he sowed also. The whole circle of human ideas and principles were recognized by this lone, wayfaring man. The first to urge extension of the principles of independence to the enslaved negro; the first to arraign monarchy, and to point out the danger of its survival in the presidency; the first to propose articles of a more thorough nationality to the new-born states; the first to advocate international arbitration; the first to expose the absurdity and criminality of dueling; the first to suggest more rational ideas of marriage and divorce; the first to advocate national and international copyright; the first to plead for the animals; the first to demand justice for woman—what brilliant would our modern reformers have contributed to a coronet for that man's brow had he not persistently worshiped the God of his fathers after the way that the theologians call heresy!—Review of Conway's Life of Paine in the Literary Digest.

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

News of the Week.

BLAINE seems to be dying.

THE Colorado House of Representatives on its assembling was thrown into uproar by a prayer of Chaplain Peck containing disgraceful partisan allusions.

DURING the time since the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art has been open Sundays, it has been visited by 405,411 persons—an average of 5,869 each Sunday.

THE Mexican clergy are striving to foment a rebellion against President Diaz, whom they hate because he has established secular schools, and rules them with a rod of iron.

THE Rome correspondent of the London Times says: "Since the bull against the comet no pope has issued a more futile condemnation than that against Freemasons."

At Fuen Santa, Spain, burglars tortured a priest to make him reveal the hiding-place of some valuable offerings that had been made to the church. Finally they shot him dead.

A NEW sect has sprung up about Raleigh, N. C., called the Holy Ones. It numbers several hundred members. They condemn resort to medicine in illness, and one woman, Mrs. Rosa Hill, recently permitted her child to die rather than call a doctor.

REVIVAL of the whipping-post in New Jersey is being canvassed. The opinion of the wiser heads is against it, saying that it almost inevitably makes the offender more reckless than before, and prepares him, if not for the repetition of the offense, for others even more injurious to society.

A STATEMENT cabled to London from Shanghai purports to give the views of the educated classes of Chinese in regard to foreign missionaries and demanding the withdrawal of the foreign missions from Chinese territory, which, it is claimed, have utterly failed in the objects they were intended to accomplish and tend only to foment revolt.

REV. MR. WOOD, a Protestant clergyman of Detroit, Mich., who disapproves the Protestant crusade in that city against Catholics, in a sermon against it the other Sunday said: "Some brothers are now standing in shame on the platform of the church and instead of preaching the words of Jesus Christ are telling their congregations where to buy their things."

A CIRCULAR is being distributed representing the pope as calling upon the priests and laymen of the United States to use their political influence as citizens of America in securing for him complete control over temporalities in this country. It states that the meeting of Congress is to be the signal for the seizure of the government by the Catholics. The Catholic prelates are denouncing it as a fabrication of Protestant anti-Catholic societies.

THE Catholic church at Albuquerque, N. M., which had its image of Christ "desecrated," on the next night was visited by another party who with axes and sledgehammers battered in the doors of the church, the adjoining residence of the Jesuit fathers, and the sisters' convent. The fathers were deterred from showing themselves by fear of what acts might be prompted by the anticlerical spirit, which has in Mexico reached a pitch of indignation against priestly fraud unknown in the United States.

A COMPANY of business men are digging for buried gold at Typozottan, Mex. It is said that Jesuits once controlling the cathedral acquired $25,000,000 in gold, and on being banished by the government about 1790 could carry off only $3,500,000 and buried the remaining $21,500,000. A few years ago while repairs were being made in the cathedral $500,000 in gold was found under the altar. The government, which in the last few decades has brought the clergy under and is ruling them harshly, confiscated it. If, however, the present treasure is found the government will claim but five per cent.

A SERIOUS conflict has broken out in the Philippine islands between the Spanish viceroy, General Despujols, and the religious orders—Jesuits, Augustines, and Franciscans—whose chiefs have telegraphed to the Madrid government that they will leave the islands if the viceroy is not immediately recalled. These powerful orders have more influence over the natives than the Spanish authorities, and this influence the viceroy attempts to check. These orders prevented the Bible society from establishing a depot in Manila, and they were the promoters of the action of the Spanish authorities against the Protestant missionaries recently maltreated and expelled from the Caroline islands, where they had been established and flourished for upward of thirty years.

DUST-PROOF GOLD-PLATED CASE.

American Lever Movement, Patent Escapement and Regulator, Patent Winding and Setting Attachment Requiring no Key, 240 Beats to Minute; Hour, Minute, and second Hands.

THE CHEAPEST GENUINE AMERICAN WATCH EVER SOLD. TIMED, TESTED, AND REGULATED. EVERY WATCH GUARANTEED.

The case is strong and tight, of solid composition metal used the world over as a substitute for Gold, with an elegant Gold Plated Chain. Packed in a neat box and mailed to any address for $1.50 each; 3 for $4.00 by Express; One Dozen for $15.00 by Express.

FULLY GUARANTEED TO KEEP ACCURATE TIME.

It is fully as durable as the most expensive watch, and with fair usage will keep good time for Ten Years. This watch is being manufactured in lots of 100,000 at the rate of 1,000 per Day by the largest watch manufacturing concern in the world. This constitutes the sole reason for its low price. It is a practical illustration of what may be done in this country by machinery and skilled operators when an article can be sold in large quantities. Its parts are not made by hand by "Pauper European labor" as are most of the cheap watches now sold, which never run long and can never be repaired. Automatic machinery does everything on this watch and every part is as true as a die can make it. The movement is the same as in all American watches and is readily understood and repaired by any jeweler.

Every Watch Timed, Tested, and Regulated before leaving our hands, and carefully packed with chain.

A FEW TESTIMONIALS FOR YOU TO READ. WE HAVE THEM FROM EVERY STATE.

WEBB CITY, Jan. 9, 1893. GENTLEMEN: I am much pleased with the watch you sent me, and I will say it keeps right up on time. It has not varied any as yet. Most truly yours, DR. ANDERSON.

CATO, MASS., Jan. 6, 1893. GENTLEMEN: I take pleasure in saying the Watch you sent me gave perfect satisfaction. It is a good time-keeper and all you recommend it to be. You will be favored with an order from me soon. Yours truly, W. G. DONNELL.

CALDWELL, Jan. 3, 1893. SIRS: I received your Watch and found it to be as represented in the Twentieth Century advertisement. It would be hard to improve on its time-keeping qualities. Yours truly, MOSES HINCHCLIFFE.

FORT WAYNE, IND. R. H. INGERSOLL & BRO., Room 133, 65 Cortlandt street, New York, Kind Strs: It is a standing rule of mine when I see an admirable trait in any character, or a marked excellence in anything, to express appreciation either in public or in private. Taffy is better than epitaph. Post-mortem praises the dead no good. The corpse smells no flowers on its casket. Hence I want to say that I am delighted with your watch—a little gem. I keep it on my typewriter desk during week-days, right before my eyes, and it keeps splendid time. Faithfully yours, STEPHEN A. NORTROP.

Astronomy and Design.

It is sometimes said that the phenomena of astronomy—the positions, motions, and temperatures of the sun and the earth, and of all the other heavenly bodies—exhibit evidence of an intelligent designer. The fact is, however, that they do not present a vestige of such evidence.

All the heavenly bodies have arrived at their present compositions and motions through the working of simple physical laws. Among these laws involved in the case, the chief one is Gravitation.

The system of heavenly bodies to which this earth belongs was, our latest science teaches, once in the condition of an exceedingly thin vapor or mist. Now, given this condition of things, we can see how there must necessarily have resulted from it the present constitution and motion of the sun and planets. We can trace step by step how this constitution and motion have come about, at each point governed by none but the elementary laws of nature which we see in operation in our homes and gardens every day. The process is usually stated about in the following language: Any slight inequality in the density of this world-mist would, in obedience to the law of gravitation by which greater or denser masses attract less great or dense ones, result in the drawing of the rarer parts to any part that was denser; and as these rarer parts could not move toward the denser in straight lines, but would be deflected by the medium through which they would have to move into curves, the whole mass of the world-mist would presently be moving about in a curve; and thus our present motions have resulted. And as the denser part continued to draw more and more of the matter and grow yet denser, and the whole mass continued to whirl about faster and faster, the parts which were most tardy in becoming dense would take the shape of a ring around the denser part; and this ring would because of its inequalities of density presently split up into separate bodies; and thus the forms of the sun and the planets revolving around it have resulted. And while some of these parts of the ring, or planets, perhaps would by their motion be carried out of the influence of our sun off to other suns or stars, and others by having a less motion and being more exposed to the attraction of the sun would be drawn into that body, some few in which the impulse of their motion, or centrifugal force, just balanced the attraction of the sun, or gravitative force, would continue to revolve about the sun as separate bodies indefinitely; and of the eight planets which have done so our earth is one. One more leading feature of our solar system remains to be accounted for—the heat and light which we find the sun outpouring; and this we discover would have been produced by the densening of the primary world-mist, in obedience to the law by which all matter when condensing throws off heat.

These laws named are not remote or little known. They conduct the commonest operations of nature about us daily. If the Theist while inditing his reasonings will pause and relax his fingers, the small mass of his pen will be drawn to the greater mass of the earth by gravitation, as all of the primary world-mist was drawn to the sun. If he will tie the pen to a string and twirl it about, its rotary motion will counteract the attraction of the earth and till he relaxes the motion it will not fall, as the earth does not fall into the sun. If he will set his ink-bottle in the snow outside, the condensation of the ink into ice will be accompanied by the communication of its warmth to the surrounding colder substance, as the condensation of matter in the sun is being accompanied by the communication of its warmth to the earth. Or he may arrange more elaborate experiments, like those of M. Plateau:

“A mass of oil poured into a mixture of water and alcohol of the same density as itself, will be seen to assume the spherical shape which molecular attraction would tend to give it. If it is made to turn around its vertical diameter at an increased rate of speed, the sphere will be found first to flatten, and after a certain length of time to detach a ring similar to that of Saturn. As the speed is still further increased, the ring will be broken up, and form into small spheres revolving upon their own axes and around the main mass.”

The mention in the above quotation of the ring of Saturn leads us to the fact that the processes which we have outlined above are going on around us now. We need not try the experiments recommended above, for we can look upon the heavens and see the actual processes of world-formation now going on about us. For there are fragments of this primary world-vapor yet remaining in our system of sun and planets, not yet merged and condensed in the larger and denser bodies. And there are still larger masses of it outside of our system amid the stars. These masses of gas are of various degrees of rareness. Some have solid centers, thus apparently being well advanced toward solidification into worlds such as ours. Many of them have a double motion resembling that of our sun and its planets, and are likely to develop into such in the end. By comparison of early with recent observations we have been able to recognize changes going on in some of them. The planet Saturn, a member of the same system as our earth, is yet encircled by a ring of such gas. These bodies all appear to have a rotary motion, like our earth.

Indeed, this rotary motion is the rule among the heavenly bodies. Equally general is the curved line of motion in their progress through space. Among these masses there is found no motion in straight lines. Hence our earth's rotary motion, and its revolution about its sun, are not to be supposed specially assigned to it that it may be habitable by life, but instead are merely particular instances under general laws governing countless other bodies.

Further upon this point—that we may observe the processes of world-formation going on about us to-day under purely natural laws—we will add to those already named two more classes of bodies involved in the process. These two are the comets and the meteorites. These stray fragments perhaps were thrown into such courses at the time of the formation of our solar system that they could not unite with any of the larger bodies, or perhaps they are continually being projected from our sun by explosions, or perhaps they emanate from some other source. In any case, they are instances of continual development, change, in the state of the heavenly bodies, and lend their countenance to the doctrine of world-growth as opposed to that of a finished creation by a god. These two classes we shall have more to say upon a little farther along.

We have said that world-development may be seen proceeding in the mists, or nebulae, in comets, and in meteorites; now we add that it may likewise be observed in the larger and more mature bodies. The sun itself exhibits one stage of the process. The planets present various others. The moon, burnt out and dead, displays the final term. The millions of stars which spangle the sky represent the same state, newly condensed and glowing with heat and light, as our sun.

Before leaving this point of world-formation, we will add that satisfying detail of all the declarations that we have made on it may be obtained in a number of late works by Evolutionary scientists, the best probably being Spencer's “First Principles.”

Now let us turn to some other aspects of the matter. If this earth were the only body known in space besides the sun, advocates of design would consider this fact as highly favorable to their theory that all has been arranged with a view solely to the production and service of man. The case is, however, that space swarms with other bodies, all of which we fairly well know to be uninhabited and uninhabitable by any creature like man. And as we see that all these other bodies were produced without any intention of providing for man, we infer that the earth was produced without any intention of providing for man. Indeed, some of them, as we shall soon show, operate to man's injury. Then, too, their irregularities of size, composition, and motion, together with their conflict, change, growth, and decay, all form an aggregate of confusion, waste, and blindness of activity quite what we should expect from brute nature, and just the opposite of the finished and planful work which we should expect from a god. The first class of these bodies which we shall mention is

The stars. These bodies—consisting of all the fixed luminous points that we behold in the skies on clear nights, except the moon and the seven sister planets of the earth—all are molten and glowing masses like our sun. Those already distinguished number over sixty million. As at each enhancement of telescopic power we discover more, their number may be looked on as limitless. Of course none is inhabitable. It is not known that any of them, with the exception of one, possesses a planet, which might be inhabited as is the sun's planet the earth. Some astronomers, to be sure, class the lesser member of each of those pairs of stars called binary stars as a planet; but as each is incandescent, in the state which our own planet was in ages ago, it is untenable by life.

The planets of our solar system—Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Neptune, and the earth—are with the exception of the latter apparently uninhabitable. Some are too near the sun to support life, and others are unfitted by other circumstances. Mars is that which comes the nearest to fulfilling the conditions of life, but is still a good way from being capable of any such life as we are acquainted with.

Smaller planets, or asteroids, to the number of nearly two hundred, are found circulating in our solar system like the main planets above spoken of.

Satellites of the planets are another of these classes created with as much labor as the earth yet not bearing life like the earth, and hence giving support to the belief that the earth was not created especially for life. These small bodies, which revolve about the planets as the planets themselves do about the sun, are twenty-one in number. The earth has one, our familiar friend the moon. Neptune is the owner of two; Jupiter is attended by four; Uranus has six, and Saturn enjoys the luxury of eight.*

The comets are what may be termed the tramps of the heaven, and reflect the same discredit on its government that the flesh-and-blood tramps do upon the administration of earthly states. That is, they blemish the conception of a heavenly system ordered to man's use, and finished therefor by a competent workman without loose ends and waste. Of course, with the correct and physical view of the universe they fall in harmoniously, as do all things else. This term "comet" is applied to masses of fiery gas, sometimes with and sometimes without a solid center, which every year or oftener burst into view suddenly and unexpectedly, and usually fall nearly toward the sun at a prodigious speed, whirl around that body in curves of curious and exceptional shapes, and fly off into space nearly in the direction from which they came. Some of these vagrant objects are of such luminosity as to be visible at mid-day, as for instance that of 44 B.C., and those of 1402 and 1532. Some are of huge size. That of September, 1853, flourished a tail as broad as the space which separates the moon from the earth, viz., two hundred and forty thousand miles. It amused itself by flying along its profligate course at the rate of five hundred and seventy-six thousand miles a day. These giddy creations are so easily seducible by every nymph of Gravitation along the wayside that their revolutions are performed with great irregularity. A Middelburg astronomer went to infinite pains to calculate the return of the comet which nearly scared the life out of the good Christian folk of 1556, and he found that it should reappear in 1848, but it has not yet shown its face. As we know of no papal bull being issued against it, we are at a loss to divine the cause of its belatedness. Now, in addition to the general unnecessariness, confusedness, etc., of this class of bodies, they appear to possess the character of dangerousness to the human race. Many astronomers think that the gases of some of them would poison the atmosphere of the earth if they should enter it, and exterminate mankind. It is to be hoped that the creator of this prettyish universe will not derogate from the credit which he enjoys in the minds of too, too Theistic mankind by poisoning them all off like a brood of rats. Certainly, the fear that he will commit some such ill-advised act—the belief from appearances that he has arranged things so that this unpleasant event may sooner or later come about—tends to shake confidence in him in the views of many.

We find that to cover this theme of Astronomy and Design will require, besides this article, all the space at our disposal in our next issue; and that to answer the other points in the letter of Mr. Anderson will occupy our available columns the week after that. So, here, we may say to our readers, as the Puritan divine used to say in introducing his sermon on The Torments of Hell—"Here you see your future before you."

Acknowledgment.

Credit to Mr. E. Smith should have been given several weeks ago for a $5 bill presented to us to spread the light of Freethought. It has gone the way of the others, to scatter papers and leaflets. We also acknowledge recent gifts from our valued friends N. F. Griswold, of $2; L. C. Geertson, $5; Wm. T. Carter, M.D., $1; John Morse, 50 cents. The wish of most of these donors is that the money be used to distribute World's Fair leaflets. This has been done. We are willing to be almoners in this matter, but we recommend to the attention of opposers of Sunday Closing the example of Mr. Louis Adler, of Lexington, Ky., who sent for $5 worth to use in his town. More than a few people in that city will get their eyes opened.

We are truly grateful for these lifts in the work, and no less for the encouraging words which accompany them. To those also who have sent new subscribers we return heartiest thanks. We assure all that we fully appreciate their aid, without which substantial progress cannot be made. And we trust that we shall deserve it also from others.

We send this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER to many hundreds of people throughout the country who will now see it for the first time. Every one of them may know that he has been remembered by some Freethought friend, who has sent us his name, and a keen sense of courtesy for that friend's thoughtfulness ought to induce the recipient to subscribe, which he is hereby invited to do. But whether we get a subscriber or not, hundreds of brains will be given an impetus to think in a new direction, and that is half the battle. These new readers are assured that this issue is but a fair example of what THE TRUTH SEEKER is every week—filled with solid food for thought, intelligence not obtained elsewhere, and scientific expositions of great value to one who thinks for himself. So we invite them, one and all, to send us a year's subscription, or such part thereof as they find convenient.

Our Work With Congress.

The Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives was compelled last week to listen to good solid Freethought reasons why the World's Fair should not be closed to the great American public on Sundays. They were much averse to hearing any arguments, but were forced to by the various interests. They found also that Mr. Putnam had a few thousand people with him, and they were compelled to listen to him with the rest.

The prospects for repealing the Sunday-closing clause are not so encouraging as we could wish, though Mayor Washburne of Chicago takes a rosy view of the situation. But the Washington correspondent of the Times of that city describes the situation in this way:

"What Sunday opening is in danger of is inaction. The committee has taken little interest in the hearings. At no time has a quorum of the committee been present. The committee shows no disposition to act, and there are reasons to apprehend that it will not report the Dur-borow resolution at all. If it should report the resolution it would be difficult to get the matter before the house unless a majority of the members wanted it considered, and a majority of the members would rather not have the question brought up.

"Of course, all the Sunday closers want to sidetrack the resolution, and of the members who individually want the Fair opened many would rather not be called on to vote again on the Sunday question. They will not ask the committee on rules to give the resolution a day, and if it got a day they would be likely to absent themselves. This would probably leave the Sunday closers in a majority.

"The most sanguine advocates of Sunday opening only say that the chances of success are reasonably good. Other advocates of Sunday opening say privately that the House will not repeal the Sunday-closing condition. Inaction by the committee and House rather than adverse action is the thing feared."

This agrees with our advice from Mr. Putnam, who will be compelled by the attitude of the committee to stay in Washington for several weeks longer. If the committee conclude to report the resolutions, the subject can only be brought before the House by special vote of the Committee on Rules, which has already reported enough to take up two years' time of Congress. It will be Mr. Putnam's task to induce the committee to report the resolutions and then to induce the House to act upon them. Naturally any action will be opposed by the Sunday-closing element, which is manifesting itself very strongly. The churches and ministers are hard at work, and, we are sorry to say, with apparent effectiveness. They are making Sunday closing an issue and have no hesitancy about bulldozing their Congressional representatives or anyone else they can get hold of. The Congressmen are overwhelmed with letters from churchmen, and it has had an effect upon them. The trouble is that a large number of members who believe in Sunday opening on principle and as a matter of right are too timid to vote their convictions in the face of organized opposition from the churches and ministers. These statesmen argue that the men who want the Fair open on Sunday are reasonable men who will not permit their judgment or their votes to be affected by failure to get what they want. While on the other hand the church people who are for Sunday closing will, if their wishes are thwarted, lose their tempers and at the next election make trouble for those who vote against them. This reasoning shows that the Freethinkers could resort to a little bulldozing with advantage. The vote of a Freethinker counts as large a one as the vote of the most bigoted preacher in the country. Our "statesmen" should be told of this fact.

The thing to do then, is to write early and write often and write hard and loud to the men who fill representative positions in Washington. And while writing to representatives drop a friendly note also to Mr. Putnam, at 1,325 G street N.W., telling him of what you have done and assuring him of your aid. He is working single-handed and alone there for our cause, and deserves and should have all the moral and financial support Freethinkers can give him. Write to your Congressman at once!

Rev. J. F. Carson, of a Brooklyn Presbyterian church, a Sunday or two ago preached a sermon entitled "The Vaporings of Robert Ingersoll." He said: "The religious sentiment of Brooklyn was outraged on last Sabbath evening by the utterances of a man who is recognized as the leader of modern infidelity. In his lecture on 'The Gods' Mr. Ingersoll asserts that God is a creature of the imagination and that every nation sets up for itself its own peculiar god. If Mr. Ingersoll's assertions are true, then the history of the world must be revised, aye, rewritten, and it must be shown that Judas Iscariot was a better man than Jesus Christ; that Bradlaugh was a better man than Gladstone; that Robert G. Ingersoll is a better citizen than Rev. Phillips Brooks." It is as pleasing as it is rare to meet a pulpitic utterance with which we can agree in so many points. For true it is, good parsoning, that (1) God is a creature of the imagination, that (2) every nation does set up for itself its own peculiar god, that (3) the history of the world must be revised, aye, rewritten, that (4) Judas Iscariot was a better man than Jesus Christ, that (5) Bradlaugh was a better man than Gladstone, and that (6) Robert G. Ingersoll is a better citizen than Rev. Phillips Brooks.

Our Distant Brother Manifest.

MY DEAR BROTHER: When I first jarred loose from my native state of Maine and took my way toward the West, I did not think that I should make so long a journey before settling down permanently. It is always hard to tell how such breaks as I then made will "terminate in the end," as we say here, but I suppose one reason why I did not reflect more accurately upon the subject is that I was only a year old at the time to which I allude. But we will let that pass.

You remember that possibly ten years ago you put on the exchange list of THE TRUTH SEEKER a newspaper with a big eye in the head of it; and that it was one of those papers which struck the reader as having somebody behind it actuated by a certain amount of cussedness. It was the Eye, which still flourishes and the editor of which I now am. My associate, Packard, is the actuated party.

This city of Snohomish is quite an old town. I suppose that white people came to this vicinity and settled as much as forty years ago. We have a character in this western country that older parts know nothing about. It is the Father of the City. The father of the city came here to the northwest before the war. Why he did so I have never inquired. He took up a claim or two, agriculture or timber, or both. Perhaps he opened a tavern or a store, or both, and by swapping red liquor for the red man's product, labor, or land, acquired a whole lot of desirable domain. In some cases he sorted out the best-looking squaw available and so had a housekeeper. Logging men from Maine and Wisconsin were the pioneers of the region, and their trade built up the settlements. The prospective father of the city hung on to his land and got more as fast as he could.

The late H. L. Vesler was called the father of Seattle and saw it grow from a lumber camp to a city of upward of fifty thousand inhabitants. Down the river a few miles from where I pen these lines is the town of Lowell, the father of which still exists, and he isn't an old man either. The townsite that a few gallons of whisky and a plug of tobacco would have bought at the time Mr. Smith attained his majority is now worth a half a million or so.

The sire of Snohomish is the Hon. E. C. Ferguson, who is called Ferg. to show that we are not stuck up. He got here early and stayed, and now he has his reward. A well-located lot 60 x 120 is worth as much to-day as the townsite would have sold for when he discovered it, and as he has more lots than there are shingles on a barn, I presume he feels that his life has not been wholly thrown away. The people here who have made our city's parent wealthy have also made him distinguished. Until within the past few years he presided over all public meetings, and over conventions Democratic or Republican with equal dignity; he has been to the legislature and is the permanent mayor. Of late the county has got a trifle too large for him to handle, but the city is his.

The aborigin of the Sound country still walks the streets of its cities. He is not a high type of humanity, being undersized, intellectually feeble, and constitutionally opposed to labor. The Snohomish Indian is known as the Siwash, and he looks upon himself as the noblest work of an ingenious creator. The term Siwash, as I understand it, is Indian for man, from the original and genuine type. The whites are Boston-men and classed with the Chinese as no mold. The Snohomish Indians were always tolerably friendly to white men, in which respect they differed from the Northern or Klickitat Indians, who regarded the early settler as his game and therefore hunted him.

A good many of the pioneers in this section a generation ago took Indian women for companions and housekeepers, and proceeded to populate the country. In those days it was the respectable thing to do. Some very fine young men and some very handsome young women are the result. Also others who are not so fine or so handsome. The half-breed young man, in many instances, is more given to loping over the trail on a cayuse than to following industrial pursuits. Those that have inherited ranches make first-class farmers. Some years ago the courts ordered that all squaw men (men living with Indian women) should marry their housekeepers or leave them. The result was separation in some cases and marriage in others.

White men who left their Indian wives often did worse later on. Those who went through the formality of a marriage ceremony have, so far as I can see, no reason to regret it. Their sons are well reared and their daughters marry well. Custom, however, does not permit public allusion to the mixed blood. If a pioneer dies, the newspaper reporting his death may not with propriety say that his relict is a native. If a daughter marries, no allusion to her mother is permissible, though her father's history may be given in full and he will renew his subscription the next time he comes into town.

I got myself into trouble once by going too deep into history before I found out how things stood. An old and wealthy rancher died and had a largely attended funeral. In the front pew sat an intelligent-looking lady in deep mourning, two or three handsome young women, and as many well dressed and well-appearing young men. They composed the family of the deceased. While noticeably of the brunet type the said family was one of which any man might be justifiably proud. In reporting the funeral I alluded to the visible traces of aboriginal blood, which was a very serious break; but I ripped things all the way up the back by adding that the swarthy young preacher who pronounced the funeral discourse might easily have been mistaken for one of the family. It didn't take me long to find out that I had been indiscreet, for all the friends of the deceased held me up at the first opportunity and inquired if I couldn't let the dead rest. When I explained that no slur was meditated they made remarks from the tenor of which I judge that they really underestimated my intelligence. I have since been instructed in the etiquette of such occasions, but am still waiting for some one to tell me why the man with an Indian wife, or the son of an Indian mother, and the daughter of one, may not be as proud of their connection and as self-respecting as anybody else, provided they know as much and behave as well as the balance of the population.

Snohomish has seven or eight church organizations and five church buildings. The Catholic branch has the least local strength. Since that old reprobate, Father Francis Xavier Guay, was tarred and feathered and unanimously requested to accept some other charge, the church has not been able to recover its former hold upon the community. The sisters of mercy held on for a while, but when the mother superior sequestered a small-pox patient, started a private burying-ground in the backyard, and then got out of town in the night, under the well-grounded apprehension that she would otherwise be burnt out, good Romanists were heard to say that Snohomish appeared to contain an element prejudicial to the spread of Catholicism.

The state of Washington suffers (so I understand, though I haven't heard her groan) from the lack of a law against Sunday labor, and our city ordinances contain no reference to such desecration. There came pretty near being a test case of the matter last summer, in which your correspondent was selected as the defendant. The offense consisted in the digging of a hole, by myself and others, for the reception of a liberty pole to be dedicated on the Fourth of July. Our Presbyterian clergyman opened hostilities by commanding us to desist, and upon our refusing to do so brought the city marshal to the spot. In the absence of any ordinance to work under, the marshal's intervention was merely advisory and did not prove effective. The county officials were appealed to, but the prosecuting attorney had his sporting clothes on and would not abandon the project of catching a few trout, Sunday or no Sunday. The clergyman had not proceeded far toward the sheriff's residence, before he ran across one of his deacons hoeing potatoes in his garden. This raised in his mind the question whether hoeing potatoes on Sunday was not quite as culpable as raising a liberty pole, and he turned homeward in a state of great depression. The flagstaff went up, and I suppose the potatoes got hoed, but in view of the hostile attitude of the clergy the liberty pole was dedicated and the flag raised without religious services. However, the mayor presided, the city attorney delivered an oration, a member of the bar read the Declaration of Independence, and our county auditor gave us Webster's invocation for the preservation of the American Union. The flag and the pole were presented to the city, but I expect that the clergyman has repudiated the whole outfit, for he immediately got a flag of his own, which, on Columbus day, he had flung to the breeze, or the fog rather, before our color sergeant was out of bed.

If these remarks do not cause you to lose any subscribers who have taken your paper from its first issue, but have to draw the line somewhere, I may write you again. Snohomish differs more or less from New York, and you may be interested to know in what regard. I send greeting to such of your readers as recall the Man with the Badgepin, who, chastened by experience and sobered by paternal responsibilities, is Your affectionate brother, GEO. E. MACDONALD.

One Thing and Another.

The rather pious house of Funk & Wagnalls publishes in the Literary Digest THE TRUTH SEEKER's recent statement upon the effect of Professor Briggs's teaching. The editor of the Digest regards our journal as an "Infidel organ."

The new lectures by Colonel Ingersoll are not yet in print in pamphlet form, and may not be until Mr. Farrell publishes new editions of his books. We have a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER returned from newsdealers containing the lecture on Voltaire, but even that supply is very limited. What we have, however, will be sent to early purchasers—14 cents for the two numbers.

The Leaflet advocating the Sunday opening of the World's Fair ought to be scattered by the thousands. We are now sending them to Congressmen and to others who may be influenced by argument. We need money to do this, and those who can afford to aid are requested to do so. The price of the Leaflet is 25 cents per dozen; $1.50 per hundred. Anyone who will distribute five hundred or a thousand can obtain them at special rates.

We shall shortly publish the fourth edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." If our readers see any records of the clergy being guilty of ministerial conduct, from lying to murder, they will add to the world's knowledge and the cause of truth by marking the report and forwarding the paper containing it to this office. We desire to do all the justice possible to the reverend clergy who so kindly constitute themselves our moral and religious guardians.

We have received the book spoken of last week, "Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind," and on another page will be found a comprehensive notice of it by Mr. A. L. Leubuscher, who was so much taken with it upon seeing a copy in our office that he calls the review a labor of love. The value of the work, he says, grows upon one as it is read, and he holds it to be one of the best ever published in the interest of Rationalism and Freethought. The work is fully illustrated, with explicit contents table, and compact index. Price, $2.75.

Our readers who are acquainted with Dr. Edgar C. Beall, the well-known author of "The Brain and the Bible," and a phrenologist as well of Cincinnati, may be interested to learn that he is now a resident of New York, occupying a position in the editorial department of the Phrenological Journal. His professional services may be obtained hereafter at the consultation rooms of the Fowler & Wells Co. Mr. Beall is a bright writer, as his "Brain and the Bible" show, and he can probably tell as much about a man's character from looking at him as any other phrenologist—perhaps more than most.

Colonel Ingersoll will start on his Western tour January 20th for the purpose of delivering a series of lectures in Western cities. On the 22d he will lecture in Detroit on "Voltaire." From there he will go to Chicago, where on the 23d he will deliver his new lecture on "Robert Burns." He also has some law business to transact in the Windy City, which he expects to finish in time to allow him to lecture at Dowagiac on the 25th, the subject being "Shakspeare." His other dates are, Cleveland, January 27th, "Shakspeare;" Cincinnati, January 29th, "Voltaire;" Louisville, January 30th, "Shakspeare;" Lexington, January 31st, "Shakspeare."

Little Blasphemies.

The man who throws a banana skin on the sidewalk never trips over it himself, and yet we wonder at the spread of infidelity.—New York Herald.

Some boys think they are awful good 'cause their folks never misses church, rain or shine, but I notice when they have an apple they never offers me a bite. They always chums with some boys who's got poor front teeth.—Little Johnny.

Merlin: "Rev. Longwind will be glad to enter eternity, I fancy."
Godwin: "Why?"
Merlin: "He will then have time to preach as long a sermon as he likes."

Elder Berry: "I think I made an impression on Job-lots to-day; I was reading him about the many mansions."

Dr. Thirdly: "Did he want one?"
Elder Berry: "He didn't go as far as that; but he admitted that flats had their advantages."

Science and Progress.

Consistent Spaniards.

A committee of duchesses and countesses called upon Premier Sagasta last week to make him veto the proposed inauguration of a Protestant church in a suburb of Madrid. Our evangelical reviews justly remark that Spain is at least a hundred years behind the progressive nations of Europe, but we should add that Spanish Freethinkers are generally radicals and begin to form an influential faction in national politics. Spain, indeed, has no lack of Protestants, but they are consistent enough to protest against Jerusalem as well as Rome. They prefer positiv facts to half-wayisms, and do not try to compromise science and the New Testament. As the philosopher Schopenhauer aptly summed up the standpoint of the Christian sects: "You teach myths," says the Anglican bishop to his Roman Catholic brother. "And you don't teach Christianity," justly retorts the Catholic. For or against, Science or Bible. We cannot dispute our brother's privilege to prefer faith to reason, but if we want to collect tithes in the name of the man of Galilee, we have no right to reject penance and the monastic worship of sorrow.

Where the Birds Go.

"What becomes of dead birds?" is a question that has puzzled the naturalists of all nations. How is it that their bodies are so rarely found by hunters and peasants? Even Professor Agassiz despaired of fathoming the mystery, but a gleam of hope comes from Transylvania, where a hermit has founded a new sect on the principle that repentance is unavailing unless followed by a public confession of sins. If the worthy reformer should establish a mission among our rural darkies, the problem of ages might yet be solved, as far as the total disappearance of turkeys is concerned.

A Chamber of Science.

When the emperor Napoleon visited the city of Amsterdam he was struck by the stately appearance of the new custom house and the large number of rooms sheltered by the roof of the vast edifice. "I hear you are going to start a bureau of commerce in one of these halls?" he asked the burgomaster, who had volunteered the functions of a cicerone. "Yes, but we had better stick to the right name; they call it a 'chamber of commerce,'" said the frank Dutchman. "Your majesty has not left us commerce enough to fill a hall." On the same principle the city of Vienna ought to call her new academy a chamber of commerce. Count Taaffe, the Jesuit politician, has not left the Austrian empire science enough to justify the need of a "lyceum."

Climate and Freethought.

On our own side of the Atlantic the prevalence of Freethought seems to increase with the distance from the equator. In Europe, too, Rationalism is a product of the higher latitudes, and the dominions of the czar make only an apparent exception from that rule. Baron Hanstein, who can claim a thorough acquaintance with the social condition of the Russian empire, remarks that the "creed of science" (Agnosticism) has become a sort of Freemasonry among the educated classes of northern Russia, and that at the fashionable supper tables of St. Petersburg the ridicule of orthodox absurdities forms a favorite topic of conversation, even in the presence of government officials. Professional spies, he adds, swarm among the upper ten, but they connive at such indiscretions and limit their attention to the discovery of political infidelities.

Fairies and Fire-Fiends.

Frederica Bremer, in one of her popular novels, describes a romantic boy retiring to a mountain-meadow to indulge his visions of the good old times when such solitudes were peopled with gnomes and fairies. The screech of a locomotive awakens him from his day-dream. "Hav the days of the idyls departed forever?" he asks himself; but in his revolt against the tyranny of Materialism he changes his purpose of becoming a merchant and resolves to study for the ministry. The conception is really poetic and full of suggestiveness, but it should not have been prostituted in the service of the clerical interest. The hideous dreariness of our latter-day life is compatible with the Christian worship of sorrow far more than with the pagan worship of joy. For centuries the forests of southern Europe were enlivened by the dances of nymphs and fauns; dryads whispered in the thickets, and the voice of the Echo awakened the tradition of a maid pining away in search of her lost lover. Every spring, every grove, had its tutelary deity; and no reasonable philosopher objected to the popularity of such harmless fancies. But the creed of the Galilean fanatics peopled the wilderness with demons, the exponents of anti-naturalism scented a fiend wherever the pagans had worshiped a god; the pantheon of the outdoor world became a pandemonium. A medieval woman, captured in the attempt to revisit the moonlight haunts of Diana, would at once have been burnt as a witch; and the belief in fairies, once so popular in northern Europe, was merely a revival of paganism, and was fiercely suppressed by the priests, who cut down sacred groves and arrested ballad-singers to crush out the last lingering traces of nature-worship.

Indiscreet Bigots.

The revelations of the Panama scandal have awakened the hyena-houls of bigots all over France, and the champions of the Orleanist party plainly insinuate that the prevalence of corruption is due to the social and religious license incident to a republican form of government, and that an honest administration of public affairs is impossible without the restoration of the royal exiles. Boodle epidemics seem, indeed, to have spread from the United States to the transatlantic republics (for the Swiss Bund is now investigating a scandal of its own), but the Orleanists forget that all the national and international swindles of this century are dwarfed by the monster fraud of the "Mississippi Land Company," organized by the mountebank Law, and that the chief patron and accomplice of that landshark was a prince of the house of Orleans.

A Business Opening.

The colonies of the Congo country seem unable to hold their own against the inroads of the Arabs, though liberal inducements have been held out to almost any kind of permanent settlers—Chinamen not excepted. Some five hundred thousand square miles of productive uplands have been practically abandoned, though there is no doubt that a few thousand resolute colonists could maintain themselves with ease against the blunderbuss-armed followers of the Prophet. The Belgian paupers prefer their slums to the wilderness of the Dark Continent; but are the Latter-day Saints not missing a rare opportunity for the reestablishment of their lost Zion? Compared with the sandhills of Utah the valley of the Congo is a paradise, and the Mohammedans would welcome the doughty polygamists as natural allies.

A Peasant Philosopher.

A little mountain house near the village of Goisern in the Austrian alps has become an object of interest to numerous tourists, and even a goal of international pilgrimages, like the cottage of Henry Thoreau at Walden pond. Its former proprietor, Anton Deubler, was in many respects the greatest living curiosity of the Alpenland. His education was that of a poor highland boy, but by reading books and newspapers whenever he could get hold of them he managed to widen his mental horizon to a degree altogether abnormal among the natives of that wilderness. At sixteen years of age he had become so disgusted with the mummeries of his village church that he preferred to pass his Sundays in the solitude of the mountains. At twenty-four he began to correspond with such men as Büchner, Huxley, and the chevalier Feuerbach, though he continued to attend to a little gristmill and shared the fare and the hardships of his rustic neighbors. Those neighbors suspected his metaphysical doxy, but respected him as a man of the most honorable principles in his dealings with his fellow-men—so much, indeed, that in 1869 they elected him mayor of Goisern. Deubler assumed the authority of that office just long enough to banish sectarian theology from the public schools, and then returned to his gristmill, having no taste for "playing the village Bismarck," as he expressed it. In midsummer he increased his emoluments by guiding tourists to the upper Alps, and thus managed to save money enough to open a little summer hotel of his own, which soon became a favorite vacation resort of the Austrian Freethinkers. The success of that venture enabled the old man to devote the few remaining years of his life to his favorite studies. Being a convert to the gospel of physical exercise, he worked a few hours at a carpenter-bench every morning; but alongside of his workshop he had a library adorned with the busts of his literary idols and the framed autographs of many distinguished visitors of his hostelry. Deubler died as he had lived, and at his special request was buried without any religious ceremonies, under a block of granite inscribed merely with his name and the date of his death.

A Digest of Science.

Rationalism received a New Year's present of immense value. It is in the shape of a volume presented by James B. Alexander, of Minneapolis, and its full title is: "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind: an attempt to show that all Organic Beings are both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments." In other words, it is a careful digest of scientific facts upon the principle that environment explains everything. This comprehensive work contains 1,067 large pages, over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, and a 3-column index of 11 pages.

The title of the book is somewhat misleading to most people, as they might conclude from the phrase, "The Dynamic Theory," that the work is a philosophical treatise, whereas it is nothing but a collation of undisputed facts silently showing by their cumulative force how moving matter molds all forms. But let the author speak for himself:

"It is my endeavor in this volume to point out that organisms, instead of being hand-made and purposive, are machine-built machines, and operated, when built, by forces outside of themselves. As we are more interested in ourselves than in other organisms, especial care has been taken to ascertain the relationship of man to other animals and to point out their resemblances and contrasts. To this end I have cited a large number of facts that cannot fail to interest every intelligent person, whether he agrees with my conclusions or not."

The following incidental summary is extracted from his chapter on "Habit," on page 315, and is a good example of the author's thought and style:

"If we now pause to take a brief retrospect of the ground thus far passed over we shall find Habit appearing as the immediate and visible cause of almost every organic change, whether in development or evolution. In the development of the embryo the successive changes follow each other in the order which the habits of myriads of generations have established. In the advance by way of these habitual changes the embryo is carried through numerous forms of no permanent use to it; forms which are maintained for only a brief space and then modified and altered out of recognition. No rational account of such an indirect and wasteful mode of developmental progress can be given, except that nature possessed no cheaper way, in general, than the way of habit. Whenever new habits have been introduced, such introduction has been effected by extremely slow processes, which have invariably consisted in the gradual modification of old habits—a modification so gradual, and taken on by steps so infinitesimal, that every habit is, to a greater or less extent, always an old habit. What has been said on bilateralism, on the evolution of the osseous system, on the effects of food, periodicity, temperature, water and desiccation, on respiration and parasitism, shows how the slow modifications of ancient habits have slowly modified the ancient organic forms. How different degrees and qualities of activity between the two sides of the body have conferred dexterity upon one side at the expense of the other, how the periodicity of the molar movements of the universe have entailed a corresponding periodicity on organic habits, which has in time been reflected on habitual organic forms, how varying habits of respiration have begotten varying forms of respiratory apparatus, and how, in the cases of animal and vegetable parasitism, the disuse of functions and habits is followed by the suppression of their characteristic organs.

"It is to habit, therefore, the habit of function or movement, that we must attribute the creation and modification of organs. This is conspicuously obvious from the numerous illustrations that have been given, and from the numerous other illustrations that cannot have failed to come under the observation of everyone. This induction implies that the function exists before the organ. It may be asked how a function can be performed before an organ for its performance has been created. The answer will be plain enough when we shall have considered the bottom facts and ultimate nature of differentiation and habit. As already observed, the habit of the organism depends on the impulses of its environment. Some of our illustrations conspicuously point this out. Such is the case in 'periodicity,' in which the movements of the solar universe entail corresponding effects in the habits of all organic beings. The degrees of saltiness or freshness in water has its effect on the organisms within its influence. The force of currents of water and air has its effect in first causing new uses to be attached to old organs of locomotion, and second, by this means of new habits, creating modifications of the organs. Endless argument might be brought to prove that the organism is made by its environment. To maintain otherwise is to hold that the organism is originally self-existent, that something may spring from nothing, that the organic being may create something from nothing, and give more than it receives. This cannot be. Whatever force or energy an organism manifests must have been loaned to it from a source outside of itself.

"Fortunately, in the matter under consideration, the original cause of organic modification may be traced and located beyond the boundaries of the organic world—using the term organic in its accustomed sense, as distinguished from the mineral or inorganic. All the habits of organic bodies, whether vegetable or animal, are traceable directly or indirectly to habits of the motion and affections of matter, which, if not original and innate, were at least anterior to organisms." The remainder of this chapter on Habit is too specific to be quoted here.

The author therefore holds and shows that the Mind is not, and cannot be, what spiritualists claim it to be, a substance, a piece of sublimated matter, a thing; but that it is and can be naught else than a habit incorporated from the environment, an aptitude, a process. He says: "I believe the present state of knowledge to be sufficiently advanced to furnish plausible, if not demonstrative, proof that the mind is not a person or thing at all, but that mental action is a form of physical energy. This theory would take mental action out of the region of fancy, whim, and caprice, and place it along with everything else in nature, under the dominion of law which we can learn to watch in its operation and trace in its certain and inevitable effects."

He disagrees with the theory of phrenology, and seeks to overthrow that system, but the two systems can be easily reconciled, and in their reconciliation the true philosophy will be found. To quote a short passage on this point from an elaborate exposition, he says (page 646): "As assumed by that (phrenological) system, the brain is the organ of the Mind; as proved by scientific research, it is the organ of the Environment. In the simplest animal forms there is no perceptible nervous system. The animal is moved by external stimuli directly applied to move the whole body of the infinitesimal animal, or some part of him. When, by evolution, the animal attained such a size that a stimulus applied on one side was too far away to affect the opposite side by direct contact, the stimulus made for itself a pathway across the body of the animal. This pathway constitutes the earliest form of the nervous system, but it involves the entire principle upon which all the subsequent developments of it are founded. No matter how extensive and complicated the nervous system becomes, it is never anything more than a pathway between the body in the environment from which the stimulus is projected, and the muscle which is adapted to be moved by it. The fact of the immense development of the brain, as a part of this pathway, does not alter the principle. The development of the brain has come about by the great number and variety of the stimuli on one side, and the great number and variety of the muscular movements possible on the other. The brain may be compared (remotely) with the central office of a city telephone system. If there were but two subscribers to the telephone, no 'central' would be required. But when there are three, a simple ganglion of switches is necessary to shunt the message and enable one to communicate with either of the others. This shunting arrangement, acting under the direction of the sender, no matter how many subscribers, never becomes anything more than an inserted adjunct in the pathway of communication, qualifying the pathway, but in no manner affecting the message. The comparison is general, but is incomplete in important particulars. The body is a community of parts having general identical interests. The stimuli from different parts and from the environment, meeting in the brain, modify, neutralize, and reinforce each other, so that the stimulus, starting from any given source, may reach a different muscle and accomplish a different motor action from what it would have done if the brain had been different or absent. But the passage of every stimulus into the brain modifies it, and renders it liable to offer a different reaction against subsequent stimuli. In this respect the central organ may be compared to a bar formed in the bed of a river by the deposit of alluvial matter, which thereafter deflects and arrests the current by which it was created."

When the author controverts the doctrine of phrenology and the dicta of common sense, which assert that the brain is the organ of the mind, he forgets what he himself argues elsewhere; he forgets that the mind is but the stored propensity of the environment, stored through countless ages of habitude; and all that phrenology and common sense claim is that a new suggestion or stimulus from the environment may liberate the storage-battery called the brain, and may use its stored propensity and aptitude to attend or mind a thing, that is, may point its discharge. We would like to hear from the author on this aspect of the case.

The author marshals his facts by the thousand to prove that all organs are the outcome of their environment. The implication from this doctrine appears to be that the Environment (or the universe at large) pressing upon the local (locked-up) organism, seems to seek for entrance and utterance; as we find that through the discharge of the tension which the Environment created in the organism, it, the environment, expresses itself. Obstacle, pressure, evil—in a word, environment—is the only god that can possibly exist. It is a *god driving us on to progress, to fuller and finer good.

In my opinion the dynamic theory alone is insufficient to explain the problems of existence; but it is a most important point of view—the point of view of the whole scientific world at the present time. The author's exposition is simple and direct, and he quotes from hundreds of works, making his treatise a vade mecum for the rational world. I have been able to do no more than to glance at passages here and there, and will not therefore point out what I conceive to be the inadequacy of the philosophical argument. But I can confidently recommend the work to all. Price of the book, $2.75.

A. L. LEUBUSCHER.

* God is the true etymological origin of the word god, though this fact is unknown to the empirical tribe of philologists and lexicographers. The word god assumes the two forms gad and god. The ancient Saxons evidently viewed God as a god and as a goat, the latter as evidenced by the Germanic form Gott for God. Gott is the go-at. Let a goat go at you from behind and you will realize whether or not he is a god.

Mr. Charlesworth on His Travels.

Upon leaving Crookston, Minn., where I had done good work, I repaired to Jamestown, N. D., where I gave three more lectures. My advent into these Northwestern states had been looked for with an eagerness mingled with curiosity, and from the results of my labors I feel confident that good will come. My first lecture was given in the court house before a scant audience; the weather was extremely cold, and the people preferred to stay indoors before the warm stove rather than venture out into the cold night with the thermometer hovering around zero. The next night we had a hall nearer town, and I was favored with a little larger audience; and upon the occasion of my last lecture not an empty seat could be found in the hall. One by one the people overcame their timidity and ventured to our meetings—a good sign, I think. The local press gave very favorable reports of my lectures, and spoke of them in highly commendatory terms. The avowed Freethinkers are very few here in this little North Dakota town, hence it is a good field for Liberal work, and in this respect it should not be neglected. James T. Ceager and Mr. Walker are among the faithful, but not "the Lord's elect." I was pleased to meet with these valiant Liberals, who are almost alone in their heterodox opinions. I was also very pleased to meet with Miss H. Putnam, who is conducting a Unitarian church in this place. Even this lady has an uphill fight before her, and has received the abuse of the masculine preachers in the community just because she is a woman and had dared to do the same as they—"preach."

Since my last report I have received in behalf of the Federation the following amounts, which have been duly placed upon our books:

Nathan Griswold, of Meriden, Conn., a vice-president of the Federation, $25; T. S. Lee, Grass Valley, Cal., $2; H. Wettstein, Marengo, Ill., $1; S. F. Benson, Pierson, Ia., $2, besides various other sums, the list of which has been mislaid but will be published in my next letter. We are still receiving lists of names for membership, and a large quantity of petitions to Congress for the Sunday opening of the World's Fair.

During my recent visit to Minneapolis I was interviewed by a Tribune reporter upon this topic, and through this I have received the following unsolicited letter from the mayor of Little Falls, Minn.:

LITTLE FALLS, MINN., Dec. 14, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Minneapolis, Minn., My Dear Sir: I learn of your object in traveling through the Northwest by the Minneapolis Tribune of yesterday. I am a believer in the principles advocated by the American Freethought Federation. Although this is a small city with a population of about five thousand, I am certain a large majority would favor Sunday opening of the World's Fair at Chicago. I presume your time is too limited to make this place a visit. I will say, however, that I would circulate or have circulated a petition here asking Congress to repeal the act closing the Fair on Sunday. If you can send me headings for the purpose and instructions with regard to the matter I should be very much obliged to you.

Yours very respectfully, N. RICHARDSON.

Is it not strange where we find Freethought principles creeping to-day? In every nook and corner of our vast territory they may be found. Will ye not help us then to weld this mass into one solid phalanx, so that we may be enabled to meet our enemies upon an equal footing? In view of the election of a United States Senator for Minnesota during the month of January, I have written to the five candidates to ascertain their position upon our principles, and without waiting for their replies to appear in regular order with my letters, they shall be published immediately upon their receipt, that Freethinkers in that state may know just what candidate to support. Our friends all over the country would render us valuable assistance in this direction if they would give me the names of all candidates for political offices in any and every election, together with their residence. Our thanks are due to Andrew Steenerson, of Crookston, Minn., for his help in this respect.

Over the broad sweeping plains of North Dakota, I continue my journey. Leaving behind the frozen Missouri river, we plunge into the hills and mountains of Montana. Here are scenes that are capable of stirring the deepest emotions of the human heart. Here are scenes sufficiently beautiful to inspire anyone with a love of nature. Never does she seem so grand as when viewed in all her rugged beauty. Massiv rocks, towering high into the clouds, obscuring the tops of them from view, are capped with almost eternal snow. What wealth, abundant wealth, lies buried under! What secrets are hidden there! Time alone may reveal them and present their history to the scrutiny of inquiring minds.

We stop for twenty minutes in Missoula, and A. M. Stevens, with a few friends, come to the depot in order to see me as I pass through. On the mountains we encounter a severe snowstorm; the elements are raging, and our progress being hindered we arrive in Spokane four hours late. Spokane is quite a busy town. Surprising it is to see such large and beautiful business blocks. The buildings will compare in size and durability with those in most of our Eastern cities. It has a population of about fifty thousand, comprising business men of tremendous enterprise and energy. I had contemplated eating my Christmas dinner alone, stowed away in some hotel, but fortunately for me, I found a hospitable welcome at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Monroe, who had ventured out into this part of the country to tempt fortune. They had come from the Buckeye state, and are relatives of Mr. Joseph Simpson, president of the Ohio State Secular Union. I met several Ohio people in this city, many of whom seemed quite anxious to talk with me, if only for a short time, about their old home. I spent a few days here and then repaired to Rosalia, where I was down for a course of lectures. Arriving at Rosalia, I soon found myself among good friends, who gave me a cordial welcome to these parts. In order to reach the home of Mr. P. Proff, I had to wade almost through a river of mud, consequent upon the melting of snow. It is a vast rolling country. Hills abound in every direction; the water rushes down their sides, filling up the passes, which makes them almost impassable. The mud is like a true friend, inclined to stick to you. But despite the adverse condition of the roads, a few came out from the country districts to attend my lectures, and these combined with the townspeople gave me a very fair audience upon the first night of my lectures—that is, considering that the town has a population of about four hundred. In most of these towns a little timidity is exhibited at first about attending a Freethought lecture, but as they proceed the people get a little more courage, and learning that they are not quite so dreadful as the preachers would have them believe, they venture out in large numbers, so that our remaining lectures were given a better attendance.

James Whaley and several other friends came from Plaza, a distance of seven miles, to hear my lectures. I was pleased to see them; also Peter Proff and family, A. Dorsey, M. Terry, and many others. I regret exceedingly that the weather prevented our venerable friend Mr. Fiske from being with us. He is a well-known Freethinker, now up in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and is almost universally admired and respected. I hope, though, to see him the next time I shall visit these parts. Several names, including those mentioned, were enrolled upon the lists of the Federation.

The woods are fairly teeming with Liberals, and the state of Washington can boast the most liberal constitution of any state in the Union. Through the unflinching efforts of our co-worker, C. B. Reynolds, religious exercises are prohibited in the public schools—no prayers said, not even a hymn sung—and all church property exceeding a valuation of $5,000 is placed upon the taxable list. And to show the honesty of Christians and their esteem for the law, many of their churches, it is claimed, though really worth more than the exemptory valuation, are valued at an exceedingly low figure in order to avoid paying their just dues as required by law. How reluctant they are to "render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's," and what a larger percentage over his proportion do they render unto God—or rather unto the clergy, which is about the same thing. What a difference here from the state of affairs in Tennessee. There Christians are persecuting Christians merely for opinion's sake. There the sunny South is blighted with the curse of Christian bigotry. There are deeds performed that will ever stand as a dark blot upon the historical records of our nation, simply because opinions differ regarding Sabbath observance. But here, in the state of Washington, the Sabbath bears no special significance over any other day, except to those who regularly attend church upon that day. While in Spokane I heard the blows of hammers, the grating of saws, upon the first day of the week. Here, business comes before religion; human welfare here, instead of human speculations somewhere else. The stores open upon that day and do a thriving business, and all this tends to confirm the fact that just as the competition for trade becomes keener, just as this struggle for existence becomes sharper, society will lose its sense of the sacred in the same proportion. I was very pleased to meet with Dr. G. W. Cary, who accompanied me upon the platform and introduced me to the audience. Dr. Mrs. Mary A. Latham is also a very Liberal woman, and counts herself upon our side. Mr. and Mrs. Moehl, with their little ones, attended our lecture, and gave me a glad welcome to the coast. Mr. Merchant, recently from Springfield, Ill., made himself known to me and shared in the common congratulations. Owing to my rapid flights from one town to another, my mail is very difficult to reach, and in consequence I have experienced considerable delay in attending to it. On looking over some of my correspondence, I find that several friends have sent post-office orders and checks payable to me. Friends would avoid considerable delay, and save us much labor and expense, if they would make all drafts, etc., payable to the treasurer, instead of myself, for as each requires my indorsement, they have to be sent to me for that purpose, and then returned to headquarters again.

I am constantly receiving lists of names for the Federation. Our numbers are still increasing, and we thank those of our friends who have so generously contributed to the movement and helped us to make it a success. Some time ago Frank Everly, of Marion, O., sent us $5 to the funds, which had been overlooked or the name had been forgotten at the time he was among the first to respond to my letter, and we beg leave to acknowledge the same now. What are we to do for Freethought during the World's Fair? Are we to keep up our heads above the stream of desuetude? Or are we to show the world that we have an existence? So far, the responses to our appeals have not been such as would warrant us taking any definite action. Still, the Federation is well out of debt, and we have a small balance on hand to begin operations. But, if we can only secure pledges of assistance, we are willing to run the risk, because a Freethinker's word is as good as his bond. We certainly should do something for the Freethinkers that will attend the Fair. We have told you what ought to be done; but whether it shall be done, or not, rests with you.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

An Irish Story.

From the London Spectator.

An Irish peasant brought a litter of kittens to a Protestant vicar in a certain town in county Wicklow, requesting him to purchase them. The vicar declined. "Your reverence, they are good Protestant kittens," urged Paddy, but his reverence remained obdurate. A few days after, the Roman Catholic priest (who had meanwhile been informed of the offer to his brother clergyman) was approached, and on his refusing to make a purchase, the would-be seller urged a sale: "Sure, father, dear, they are good Catholic kittens." "But how is this, my man?" replied the priest. "You said a day or two ago they were good Protestant kittens." "And so they were," said the peasant, "but their eyes weren't opened."

"It's a poor way to get people into the church to throw cold water on 'em," as the baby said to himself when he was christened.

With Our Congressmen.

News and Notes.

The battle royal has come off this week beneath the dome of the Capitol. The orthodox hosts have rallied from every quarter of the Union. Ponderous Joseph Cook, sleek Colonel Sheperd, cunning Wilbur Crafts, and dozens of glib clergymen, bishops, etc., with white neckties and saintly countenances, have worked like a machine in perfect order, well oiled for the occasion, to maintain the piety and Christian grace of the Congress of the United States, and ignore the Constitution and the rights of man. On the Liberal side brilliant talent has arrayed itself—though not with the force and discipline and absolute unity of the church army. For four days a tremendous agitation has been going on in the little space allotted to the committee of the Columbian Exposition for its work, but the sounds of that war will reverberate in every part of our land and throughout the world. That such a scene, however, should be witnessed in the chambers of legislation is a portent of immense significance to the republic. To allow for a moment that a legislative committee should be made the tribunal of theological and religious questions is opening the door to a vast usurpation.

The battle opened on Tuesday morning with an admirable address by Mayor Washburn of Chicago, seconded by members of the city council, and arguments in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sunday were presented in a straightforward and business-like manner. They confined themselves simply to the expediency of Sunday opening, practically admitting the right of Congress to interfere in the matter. President Gompers made an excellent plea for the working-people, and clearly showed the huge injustice of barring the gates of the Exposition to the toilers of this land. The even flow of discussion, however, was broken when Rev. A. T. Jones, of the American Sentinel, made his points, namely, on the basis of the Constitution. He was called to order—it being decided by the committee that the constitutionality of the proposed legislation should not be attacked, only the policy of the thing, for though Congressmen might mistake as to the policy of a measure, it is not to be supposed for a moment that they would ever do anything unconstitutional. On that point they are infallible, for the same reason that a king can do no wrong. Mr. Jones's appeal to constitutional law was not according to the program.

The whole of Wednesday morning was given up to Colonel Sheperd and his obedient followers, who, like clockwork, obeyed his mandates. The speakers were so numerous that only about five minutes were given to each. In opening the discussion Colonel Sheperd said: "We are now pondering heavenly things, let us do it reverently." For a while it seemed as if a prayer-meeting would be inaugurated. There were appeals to God, to the angels, to saints. Hell-fire flashed its lurid horror, the wrath of God was depicted, deathbed scenes portrayed, eternity unfolded, in fact all the paraphernalia of the pulpit appeared in this committee-room. Every sort of argument was resorted to, and it would be useless to review them. The main argument was the "boycott," that it would injure the Fair financially to open its gates in violation of the Christian conscience. One speaker figured it out that the church could boycott the Fair to the extent of a loss of $6,000,000. Although constitutional questions were expressly excluded by the committee, still the clerical exhorters were constantly insisting upon the fact that this is a Christian nation and the law must sustain the Christian Sabbath. Said Joseph Cook: "Without the Sabbath there is no church." This is the secret of the enormous struggle for Sabbath laws. The Sabbath is the bulwark of the church, and of course the clergymen will fight for it. It is their forlorn hope.

Thursday morning one hour was given to the church party and one hour to the Liberal party. Dr. Herrick Johnson delivered the main speech for the Sunday closing. He has a thoroughly inquisitorial look, and I am sure he would burn me at the stake if he had a chance, and every heretic besides. His argument was: "Close the gates or be damned."

The ladies on this occasion made the most notable display for Liberal thought. They were graceful, dignified, and eloquent in their presentation of the desire of the Women's Club of Chicago to see the gates of the beautiful Exposition thrown open to all the world. Susan B. Anthony spoke to the same effect. Also, the only Freethinker there, the writer of these notes. Rev. Mr. Cross, Rev. Mr. Savage, Dr. Lewis, a Seventh Day Baptist; and Mr. Ringgold, of Baltimore, made pleas for Sunday opening, and others against—the time for debate being extended thirty minutes.

Saturday morning the orthodox held the fort for an hour, and fired their big guns at the committee. The arguments for the other side were presented by Thomas P. Morgan and Mr. Askew, of Chicago, and Rev. Dr. Thomas. After a little running fire between the opposing sides, the great debate of four days was closed. It is impossible for me to give more than a summary of this important discussion. The papers throughout the country will more or less report the proceedings and the addresses. The first round has been fought, but the end is not yet. What was before the committee is but a prelude of what will come before Congress, and eventually before the whole American people. Never was I more deeply impressed with the fact that we are in the midst of a mighty revolution. It was not mere fireworks that flashed in the committee's room, it was not mere rhetoric, but the earnest of a conflict vast and terrible, whose issue is not yet. It is the old contest of freedom and slavery.

I am sorry from my standpoint that the fight for Sunday opening has opened upon the line it has. I think a very great mistake has been made—not only as to matter of principle, but of policy also. In fact, to stick to principle is after all the best policy. Mr. Jones, of the American Sentinel, and myself, are both excluded at present from working along the line selected by the majority of the friends of Sunday opening. They have chosen to concede somewhat to the Sabbath sentiment and to ask only for a modification of the present restriction, enough to allow the gates to be open, but no machinery to be in operation. That is, the friends of Sunday have concluded to support Resolution 163 as printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 31st.

As a matter of principle I cannot support this resolution. It equally violates the Constitution with the original restriction. Congress has no jurisdiction in the matter. That is the only position for a Secularist to take. Of course if Congress has a right to stop machinery, it has a right to close the gates. This is not a matter of policy, therefore, but of constitutional law.

I was granted the opportunity to speak before the committee, but did not speak to Resolution 163, but to Resolution 177. My argument, like that of Mr. Jones, is entirely constitutional. I would not argue the policy of the thing before the committee, for by so doing I should grant the jurisdiction of Congress, which jurisdiction I absolutely deny.

I am satisfied from a survey of the situation that if the friends of Sunday opening had adopted the line of Mr. Jones and myself they would have been successful, simply because they would have been impregnable.

The legislation concerning Sunday observance is beyond doubt one of the reserved rights of the states, and if Mayor Washburn and the common council of Chicago, and the Sunday Opening Association, and Chairman Durbin, and the Woman's Club, had concentrated their efforts upon the constitutionality of the law, they would have won by a large majority, especially in a Democratic House, where there is still some tradition of the principles of Jefferson. I am sure that the friends of Sunday opening must eventually accept this line of battle. It will not do to compromise. It has not lessened the Christian opposition. It has rather intensified it. The orthodox don't want half-way work. They want all or nothing. I say so too. Let us have a fair and square issue.

This compromise divides our own ranks; but if we take the constitutional question on that we are a unit. Rev. Mr. Savage was willing to have the Fair closed Sunday mornings. I am not willing. On that point we differ materially. Rev. Mr. Thomas was in favor of religious services on the Fair grounds. I am not. But as to the question of the constitutional power of Congress there can be no division. The Illinois Senate and House of Representatives in the resolutions now before them take the same ground as Mr. Jones and myself—the ground of unconstitutionality.

One Congressman says: "I wish it was out of Congress. Whichever way we vote now we make enemies." That's a general feeling in Congress as things now are. It does not want the responsibility, and would gladly get rid of it; and the Constitution helps them out of the difficulty, but the compromise resolution does not. It equally thrusts the responsibility upon Congress, and it will say, "Let things remain as they are," while if the constitutional point were vigorously pressed by petitions by the city of Chicago and the state of Illinois, I have no doubt that Congress would admit the plea, and throw off the responsibility of any further endeavor at theological legislation, which is not only unconstitutional, but centralizing in a most dangerous degree.

I don't give up the fight by any means. I wouldn't be much of a Freethinker if I did, simply because I was in the minority. I know that I am right, and I believe the question will be settled eventually as a constitutional question. I shall remain with Congress throughout the session. There is no question but that this is my post of duty. It is a matter of supreme importance. If this action of Congress is not reversed, the orthodox party have won a victory over human rights that it will take years of conflict to annul. I had hoped when I first came to Washington that the matter would be speedily settled. I find that it will not be, and between now and the 1st of March there must be the most strenuous labor for the cause of Secularism. The opportunity will never come again. With the life of this Congress is the triumph or the defeat of ecclesiastical tyranny.

Many Liberal friends throughout the country have contributed generously to my support here, and I thank them for their cordial aid; but I would say to any Liberal friend who reads these notes, and realizes that this is one of the greatest struggles for liberty that has taken place in this country—I would say, Give a little help. Send what you can. I do not need much, but something from every comrade. I shall remain at Washington until this Congress ceases to be, and the battle is transferred to other fields. I know well enough that I shall have the assistance which will enable me to carry on this warfare on the line marked out—not of compromise and expediency, but of constitutional law and human right.

Let every friend answer this immediately with what he can conveniently contribute, at 1,325 G street N.W., Washington, D. C.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Constitution and Holy-days and Holidays.

ARGUMENT BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM BEFORE THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 12TH, AGAINST THE SUNDAY-CLOSING CLAUSE.

So far as Sunday is different from any other day of the week, it is either a holy-day or a holiday. If therefore there is to be any legislation concerning the observance of this day, it must be on the ground that it is a holy-day or a holiday.

A holy-day is necessarily a religious or church day. If there were no religion or no church there would be no holy-day. Legislation therefore for the observance of Sunday as a holy-day is religious legislation—that is, it is legislation for the establishment of a religious or church observance, and therefore for an establishment of religion itself. But such legislation is absolutely forbidden by the Constitution. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Madison says that "religion is entirely beyond the purview of government." Washington says, "In no sense whatever is this government founded upon the Christian religion." Jefferson has stated the unconstitutionality of religious legislation. In a letter Jan. 23, 1808, to the Rev. Mr. Millar he writes:

Washington, January 23, 1808.—SIR: I have duly received your favor of the eighteenth, and am thankful to you for having written it, because it is more agreeable to prevent than to refuse what I do not think myself authorized to comply with. I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises. This results not only from the provision that no law shall be made respecting the establishment or free exercise of religion, but from that, also, which reserves to the states the powers not delegated to the United States. Certainly, no power to prescribe any religious exercise, or to assume authority in religious discipline, has been delegated to the general government. It must, then, rest with the states as far as it can lie in any human authority. But it is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe, a day of fasting and prayer. That is, that I should indirectly assume to the United States an authority over religious exercises, which the Constitution has directly precluded them from. It must be meant, too, that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it; not, indeed, of fine and imprisonment, but of some degree of proscription, perhaps in public opinion. And does the change in the nature of the penalty make the recommendation less a law of conduct for those to whom it is directed? I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises, its discipline, or its doctrines; nor of the religious societies, that the general government should be invested with the power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises; the enjoining them, an act of discipline. Every religious society has a right to determine for itself the times for these exercises, and the objects proper for them, according to their own particular tenets; and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it.

In his autobiography Jefferson also relates:

The bill for establishing religious freedom, the principles of which had to a certain degree been enacted before, I had drawn in all the latitude of reason and of right. It met with opposition, but with some mutilations in the preamble it was finally passed; and a singular proposition proved that its protection of opinion was meant to be universal. Where the preamble declares that coercion is a departure from the plan of the holy author of our religion an amendment was proposed by inserting the words "Jesus Christ" so that it should read, "A departure from the plan of Jesus Christ the holy author of our religion;" the insertion was rejected by a great majority in proof that they meant to comprehend within the mantle of its protection the Jew and the gentile, the Christian and the Mohammedan, the Hindoo and Infidel of every denomination.

There is no need of any further quotations to show that any legislation for the Christian, the religious, or the holy observance of Sunday is entirely beyond the legal power of Congress.

Every sentiment and every argument in favor of the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath should therefore have no weight with this committee, or with Congress.

The only possible ground left therefore for any legislation as to the observance of Sunday is the fact that it is a holiday or rest-day.

A holiday is for physical recreation; it is a relief from toil; it is for leisure, or rest from ordinary vocations.

What has Congress to do about Sunday legislation, granting that it is a holiday or rest-day?

Simply to recognize it as a holiday—but beyond that the function of the national government does not extend.

To start right in this discussion I will again quote from Jefferson:

Our legislators are not sufficiently apprised of the rightful limits of their power; that their true office is to declare and enforce only our natural rights and duties, and to take none of them from us. The idea is quite unfounded that on entering into society we give up any natural right.

It is the American principle that the government is for the people, and not the people for the government. If at any point government infringes upon any natural right at that point its action is null and void.

It is a contradiction in terms to say that in order to uphold the natural rights of any human being, the natural rights of any other human being should be invaded. The exercise of all human rights is perfectly harmonious.

Whatever legislation there is, therefore, for Sunday as a holiday, or rest-day, there must be no infringement upon the natural rights of any human being.

It is the natural right of every man to labor. Government has no right to forbid labor on Sunday. If one chooses to labor on that day as on any other day it is his right to do so. For government to enforce physical idleness on Sunday is simply tyranny. Physical recreation, physical recuperation, do not necessarily demand physical idleness. A change of physical activity is oftentimes the most healthful physical recreation, or rest.

Government cannot enforce idleness any more than it can enforce sleep. As well command a man to sleep all day Sunday as to command him to be idle all day Sunday.

This point is well stated in the decision of the supreme court of California:

This argument—namely, that for the benefit of the working people government should enforce idleness on Sunday—is founded on the assumption that mankind are in the habit of working too much, and thereby entailing evil upon society; and that without compulsion, they will not seek the necessary repose which their exhausted natures demand. This is to us a new theory, and is contradicted by the history of the past and the observations of the present. We have heard in all ages of declamations and reproaches against the vice of indolence; but we have yet to learn that there has ever been any general complaint of an intemperate, vicious, unhealthy, or morbid industry. On the contrary, we know that mankind seek cessation from toil, from the natural influences of self-preservation, in the same manner and as certainly as they seek slumber, relief from pain, or food to appease their hunger. . . . If we cannot trust free agents to regulate their own labor, its times and quantity, it is difficult to trust them to make their own contracts. If the legislature could prescribe the days of rest for them, then it would seem that the same power could prescribe the hours to work, rest, and eat.—Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal., 509, 518.

The Constitution of the United States plainly declares the manner in which the national government should legislate, or rather non-legislate, concerning holidays, or rest-days. In the Constitution Sunday is recognized as a holiday, or rest-day, and only as such. When a bill has passed both houses of Congress for the signature of the president, the president shall have ten days to consider it, Sundays excepted, says the Constitution. Sunday is not a religious or a Christian word. It is simply the secular name of the day. The Christian term is the "Sabbath," or "the Lord's day." By not using either of these sacred names, but using only the secular name, the framers of the Constitution beyond question meant to recognize Sunday as a holiday, or rest-day, only, and not in any sense as a holy-day. The Constitution therefore recognizing Sunday as a holiday, how does it regulate its observance? It does not regulate it at all. It leaves the president perfectly free. It gives him the holiday, but it does not command how he shall observe it. It simply allows a privilege. The president can work on Sunday if he chooses; or play; or go to theaters and operas; or hunt and fish; or travel; or stay at home. If the president is a Jew in religion, or a Seventh Day Adventist, or a Seventh Day Baptist, the Constitution does not interfere with his religious convictions. He can keep holy the Saturday and work on Sunday.

This is an admirable example for Congress to follow—shining in the Constitution itself, placed there by the wise and far-seeing founders of this republic.

The moment Congress legislates concerning the observance of Sunday as a holiday, or rest-day, by forbidding any kind of labor, it violates the religious convictions of many of the people of this country. They conscientiously observe Saturday as a holy-day. What right has the government to compel them to lose the value of the following day, either on the plea that it is a holy-day, or holiday, or rest-day? This is a manifest injustice. Follow the Constitution and no injustice will ever be done.

In giving the appropriation to the World's Fair Congress does not undertake to regulate the observance of other holidays far more national, important, and glorious in their significance than the Sunday. It annexes no condition as to the observance of the Fourth of July or Decoration day. Surely, if Congress can leave the due observance of the Fourth of July and Decoration day to the discretion of the World's Fair commission, it can also leave the observance of Sunday to the same judgment. Congress does not regulate the expenditure of the millions given to the commission. It has the utmost confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the commission so far as the use of vast sums of money is concerned. Why not leave with the commission the regulation of Sunday? Are the commissioners honest and able six days of the week and inefficient on the seventh day? or the first day? As the Constitution left the observance of Sunday entirely to the president, let Congress be equally wise, just, and business-like in its treatment of the commissioners of the World's Fair—men selected for their preëminent fitness to carry on in all respects this magnificent enterprise. This is my argument, therefore, to the committee—that in the very nature of the national government, and according to the Constitution itself, Congress should not make any laws as to the manner of the observance of holy-days, holidays, or rest-days.

The Sunday, therefore, whether it is a holy-day, or holiday, or rest-day, is entirely outside of Congressional enactment. If there is to be any regulation it should be by municipal and local governments.

He was a believer in all that is good in the Bible, but rejected the supernatural part. He left a wife, and a son, the writer of this article, to mourn his loss. I have never taken much interest in Liberal literature, but I am a Liberal in my views, and I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and wish you great success with your paper.

A Lecturer Disseminating Truth.

SPOKANE, WASH., Jan. 2, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday, the first day of this new year, the principal hall of Spokane, namely, the Music Hall, was well filled with ladies and gentlemen to hear our great leader, John R. Charlesworth. His main subject was "Do We Live After Death?" The audience was so interested that any little move could be heard. It is too bad that a city like Spokane could not be interested enough on the subject to have him lecture once a day for one week. Then I know they would want him to stay a month, for the people were very much pleased. Everybody that can have Mr. Charlesworth stop and give a lecture will never be sorry unless because he could not stay a month. And I hope he will live long, and have success as long as he lives. I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for three or four years. While in Dakota my brother kept it, and here I have never failed to read it.

Yours for truth, D. J. MUNTER.

A Long-time Fighter for the Cause.

EDELSTEIN, ILL., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I am happy to remit subscription to the Grand Old TRUTH SEEKER. But I am getting considerably weather-beaten after battling with the storms of life on sea and shore for seventy-eight years, and may soon have to slip my cable—give up the ship—be put under hatches where creeping things revel in their spoil and fit my clay to fertilize the soil. But I hope to go with the Grand Old TRUTH SEEKER at the masthead, waving to all nations.

Yours fraternally, J. G. KENDALL.

P.S.—Mr. Macdonald, perhaps you remember the old fellow who introduced himself to you at the Pittsburgh Liberal congress and spoke to you again next year in Philadelphia. Yours very respectfully, J. G. K.

[We remember Mr. Kendall very well, and hope to meet him at many more conventions in the coming years, in spite of what he considers his "age." Elizur Wright attended several of our conventions when considerably past eighty.—Ed. T. S.]

A Lonely Freethinker.

GRAYSVILLE, TENN., Dec. 25, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Your three papers came in good time, and I have had a feast in reading them over and again. It has been fifteen years since I have had any reading matter of this kind in my house. I have a son and daughter, fourteen and sixteen years old. The son, the church can take him, he is all right; but the daughter I will have to give some reading, as her mother is just what any Bible-blower wants to see.

The Adventists here are having a good time. This week is devoted to telling God what to do—prayer. Their king-bee reminds me of Old Rocket in Macdonald's "Heathens of the Heath." His dupes—all they need is power, and I would not trust one of them sooner than I would any other so-called Christian. I am the lone one here in the village, and they have already begun to lie about me because I told the class-leaders that I had no ducats for their preacher; that I thought less prayer and more work was needed.

Yours for the truth,
J. F. WILSON.

Friendly Sentiments.

LIBBY, MONT., Dec. 31, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: You tell me you can furnish me a volume of this year's TRUTH SEEKER bound for $4. You will find inclosed $5 to pay express or other expenses and what is left use as you have a mind to, and if it is not enough charge it to me and let me know and I will remit by first mail.

I received THE TRUTH SEEKER for December 24th yesterday, and must say that that cartoon caps the climax to a T. I think it is one of the best since that with the Congressman's head appeared here some time ago. That was the only TRUTH SEEKER I ever sold. I lent it to a friend to read, as I often do, and somebody saw it, and bought it. But that was all. It is a hard matter to even get people to read, if it does not cost them anything. The most of them condemn it before they have read the heading. But that does not matter. Little by little THE TRUTH SEEKER will gain its way to the people's heart—and will make them so much the happier, for it will teach them to exchange the love of God for the love of man.

To all of you a Happy New Year.

Yours truly, J. S. ODEGAARD.

Heston [Blasphemously Compared to God.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: A Happy New Year to you and all mankind. I have received some specimen pages of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and if the remainder of the work is as good as this four-page tid-bit, every honest heart in this benighted world should sing the praise of Watson Heston. I bow in homage to his undisputed genius. He has constructed indeed a Krupp gun for honest thought—one that is sure to shatter any battle-ship along the line that Christian craft or crookedness may try to float. Within the home where minds are free it flashes forth a lighthouse glare on every hidden rock and shoal and bank of Christian duplicity. The hero of such a work has made his name immortal. It owns the subtle, secret power to push from every thinking mind the false and cruel curse of this senseless superstition, this unrelenting tyrant whose nerveless hand has cramped and crushed for ages past the brain and heart of man. A few more like our great artist and with tears of joy we could wish an everlasting farewell to those hideous monsters of the mind. For this world what a happy parting this would be, when all could honestly say: "Good-bye, Mr. God; farewell, Mr. Christ, you have fooled us now for the last time."

The Lord is mighty, I know, but Watson Heston—gentlemen, let me ask you, Where does he come in?

WILL HARRINGTON.

DELBA, TEX., Oct. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: December the 14th I will be seventy-two years old, and not able to do much but sit and knit and read, and the only pleasure I have is the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I will have to tell you to not send it after March 1st, for I will not be able to pay for it, unless some kind friend would send it me. But I do not expect to find one so generous. It will have to be given up, I expect.

We had J. Remsburg to lecture for us the last of May. A friend brought him out from Leonard, and he stopped and talked with me an hour or so. A neighbor woman was at our house, a good Baptist sister, who asked after he left how much he charged for a lecture. I told her for three $8 apiece, $9 each for two, or $10 for one. She said he came here to drain the money all out of the country. I asked how much they paid their preacher a year. She said $400 for twelve sermons a year. And they went around this fall to raise funds to pay that servant of God and got only seventy-five cents. The parson has gone, the sheep are without a shepherd. Remsburg got the shekels.

Political matters have run the people crazy here this fall. There has been powder enough fired to feed all the widows and orphans in the country had the money been put to that use, and it is not over yet. Ever your friend, HARRIET DAVIS.

A Congressman Avows His Despotism Principles.

RIDGWAY, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1892.

JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Representative in Congress of the Twenty-ninth Congressional district of the state of New York, Sir: I cut this from the Medina, N. Y., Tribune:

Congressman Wadsworth is all right on the question of Sunday closing of the World's Fair, expressing himself in a dispatch to an Albion clergyman as follows: "I have been and am opposed to the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday and shall so vote."

If it correctly reports your position on the above question, I wish to say to you that I voted for you for the present Congress, and also for your reelection, but if you come up again for any office in this district I will do what I can to defeat you. The Constitution of the United States separates church and state absolutely, and every man of you who voted to interfere with the management of the World's Fair at the dictation of the priests and clergymen, to enforce any rule or regulation of any church, in my opinion, violated his constitutional oath of office. And the inclosed leaflet entitled "Beer, Bishops, and Bribery," expresses my sentiments and opinion on all such.

I sincerely hope you are not correctly reported. If so, I will be only too glad to make due apology. GEO. L. PRATT.

P.S.—Wadsworth has acknowledged the receipt of my letter, but avows his intention to vote to close the Fair Sundays.

A Noble Old Friend of Humanity.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Dec. 23, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER some kind words of sympathy on the death of my beloved wife, for which I thank you sincerely. A good woman has gone to her rest at a ripe old age—a loving wife, mother, and friend to everybody. Blessed be her memory. In age I am but little behind—almost eighty-nine. I must soon be laid by her side. With my philosophy there is not much occasion for grief. Death to such old persons is generally more a friend than foe, if many and painful infirmities must be borne. My health is pretty good yet. I enjoy life. Hearing failing, eyesight getting dim, but I enjoy reading my good TRUTH SEEKER papers and writing to my friends, and as old as I am I write this letter without "specs"—and if you can read it you are an expert. But what was ever scribbled than an editor or printer could not read? The fine type and dim impression which is the fashion nowadays bothers me to read, but I have to put up with it.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the clearest prints I get hold of, and I hope my daughter will keep up her subscription, although we are overrun with reading matter. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a paper of great power and influence, and I hope is well sustained.

Priestcraft is rampant—may you have abundant success in your warfare against it.

Prohibition Saps Man's Self-Rule.

WALNUT, TEX., Dec. 27, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER No. 46, I noticed that Mr. Andrew Steenerson, a Freethinker, is a Prohibitionist. This is indeed very seldom the case. For after a person has cultivated his brain sufficiently to study himself out of the church he generally sees far enough to see that the Prohibition law is not a desirable law; and more than this, it will not overcome the evil, as anyone can know who has traveled through Prohibition states. And besides this, the Prohibition law would also do away with a good law now in force.

The best and only intelligent way to overcome the evil of drink is by proper penalties. I think that a man arrested for an ill conduct while partly intoxicated should always receive at least twelve hours of rest, and then work out his penalty in striped clothing on the public road nearest his home; for to drain the purse of a man partly intoxicated has as much effect on him as you would have on a ground-hog by making the sign of a cross on the end of your coat-tail.

Prohibition law takes away man's self-judgment, and thereby degrades mankind. A law should always be so constructed as to strike the violator only, and not the honest or sober party, as the Prohibition law does.

A Prohibitionist's second word is that you have no privileges in this country, and that you have no right to break your neighbor's window, use your neighbor's wood, or shoot certain birds, etc. I say that any man who says that any of his liberty is taken away by such laws is a very bad man. Such laws have no effect on me; they take away no part of my liberty. The only law that interferes with my liberty—in this state—is the Sunday law, for on Sunday I cannot go hunting, or to a beer-garden, or to picnics, or even to a dance. The wealthy people take time during the week to indulge in such pleasures, but the laborer who is compelled to put in six days of the week in his shop is deprived of such pleasures by this obnoxious Sunday law. And another such curse on this country would be the Prohibition law, for whisky is a very good and effective medicine for home use in a variety of cases, and entirely harmless should an overdose be administered so long as the patient is taken care of.

GEORGE SCHUBERT.

Bunyan Better Than Most Christians.

MONTEZUMA, I.A., Dec. 22, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: There are a considerable number of agents selling "Pilgrim's Progress," written by Bunyan. Will you state to me what kind of a man he was? I think he was a bad man. Then there is the "Holy War." What kind of a war was it that made it holy? Tell me all about the holy wars, and all about the "Pilgrim's Progress."

JOHN CHAMBERLIN.

[Bunyan was so far from being a bad man that the only serious fault he seems to have possessed was a belief in Christianity. Of what are commonly accounted vices he had none. The notion that he had arose from the strong language which he used regarding his sins, or offenses against God, which are not at all identical with vices or crimes which injure men. The four chief sins of his of which we know are dancing, ringing the bells of the parish church, playing at the innocent open-air sport of tipcat, and reading the history of Sir Bevis of Southampton. The evil of this latter book consisted in its being a romance, instead of a crabbed work of piety such as his puritanical church alone permitted to be read. Most of the above acts we should applaud as healthful and commendable diversions. The Christian church, which gets everything wrong end foremost, pronounced them sins. Then, as Bunyan had a powerful imagination, he realized the punishments which the church taught would be meted him so intensely that he became mad with terror. He perpetually fancied fiends about him, whispering heresy in his ears or trying to fly away with him. He envied, he says, the brutes, and the stones on the street and tiles on the houses, for they were not endowed with an immortal part destined to eternal agony. His biography is an instructive exposition of the misery suffered by millions in the old ages because of the detestable teaching of Christianity. The notion that he had been a very wicked youth was given additional currency by the divines of his denomination, who like many of the present day exaggerated the former turpitude of the brand whom their faith had plucked from the fire. The "Pilgrim's Progress" is a pleasant, readable allegory describing the progress of a Christian pilgrim through this world of trials and temptations. The "Holy War" is a work in similar style describing the conflict between God and Satan, holy men and unholy. You say, "Tell me all about the holy wars." This class of wars over religion, with which you supposed the book to deal, would require a library for their narration. Bennett's "Champions of the Church: Their Cruelties and Crimes," would do to begin with.—Ed. T. S.]

A Biblical Confusion Explained.

BARRE, MASS., Dec. 30, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Having seen no reply to the queries of S. R. Thorne in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 17, 1892, with your permission I will venture a few remarks on two of his most important questions, viz.: "Will not some of your able correspondents enlighten me on the following questions: 'And God said, Let us make man in our image after our likeness. So God created man in his own image. In the image of God created he him.' Now, I desire to be informed, Who was God talking to at that time? And which was created first, the serpent or Adam?"

If the first verse of the Bible was translated correctly it would read, "In the beginning the Gods created the heaven and earth." It is an Egyptian or Chaldean legend, picked up by the Bible-makers, these nations believing in a plurality of gods, being polytheists, not monotheists.

Another legend, contradicting the former, begins at verse fourth of the second chapter of Genesis. There, this wonderful creator is styled "Lord God," in an entirely different account of the same transaction. Please read the two chapters for yourselves; do not take my word for it.

Now, when these foolish barbarians translated the first verse they changed the plural noun, Elohim, into the singular number, God, instead of gods, as they were monotheists and believed in one god only. But they were not "smart enough"—to use a Yankee phrase—to translate the Hebrew pronouns into the singular so they would correspond with the singular—God—therefore you will read in chapter i, 26, that this one God apparently says to himself, "Let us make man in our image," etc.; whereas, these many gods were conferring together. You may well inquire the meaning of the plural pronouns "us" and "our" all through the account of this stupendous creation, provided there was but one god at work on the job, in which case it should read, "I will make man in my image," etc.—this one God talking to himself! Please inquire of any Hebrew scholar if the Hebrew word is not Elohim, and in the plural number, from which God is translated in the first verse of Genesis. The plural pronoun in the first chapter of the Bible, aided by the first epistle of John v, 7, helped form the impossible trinity of "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" of the ghostly Christian church.

"Which was created first, the serpent or Adam?" Neither was ever created. They evolved, as did all other productions, good, bad, and indifferent. The fable in Genesis that teaches this monstrous lie should, with Santa Claus and all similar Christian lies, be relegated to the shades of the deepest dungeon of obscurity.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Reply to the Theist.

HOWICK, CAN., Dec. 6, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 26th I notice a long letter by A. A. Chapman to which you invite answer. I think I can see why you do not take it in hand yourself. It is long and tedious to study out for the amount of intelligence it contains. The author professes belief in a supreme being, but on considering all he says for and against, one is at a loss to know if he is in earnest or only joking.

It is, however, no wonder that Mr. Chapman calls himself a Freethinker—where is the man who does not, even among the greatest fanatics? "Freethinker," like the words "liberty" and "Christianity," has no meaning until one has discovered what the utterer means by it. No religion boasts more about religious liberty than does the Roman Catholic chain-gang hierarchy. No Christian debater ever attempts to defend Christianity from the standpoint of any creed. He always formulates a nice little religion of the mildest possible form of Christianity and when garrisoned behind this impregnable breastwork he fights the Infidel but denies that there is any Christian but himself. Likewise, if anyone wishes to criticize Freethought he begins by calling himself a Freethinker.

In this case Mr. Chapman is either a Freethinker or very young in the thinking business.

If he is candid, there is hope for him; if not, answering him is a waste of time.

Mr. Chapman proves the existence of a supreme being by what he calls "the threefold logic of nature, experience, and history." Rather thin reasoning for a Freethinker. He says, "If the universe were self-derived, self-centered, self-sustained," etc. A Freethinker must be one who submits his beliefs to his own judgment. Matter being uncreatable and indestructible according to human judgment, the universe must be eternal. Hence it was never derived at all. As to its being self-sustained, self-developed, and self-governed—that is to say, that there is no intelligence connected with it, I do not know of a Freethinker that says there is or there is not. Furthermore, what difference does it make to us whether there is or not? And who is ever going to find it out, since if there is it never manifests itself to man? Do we not know that the laws of nature are inexorable—that lightning will as soon strike an angel as a devil, if he does not get out of the way? If there is an intelligence above, behind, or within the universe that controls everything (call it God or Nature if you like), does it not let the wicked prevail over the good just as often as the former happens to be the strongest? If Mr. Chapman can convince himself of the existence of a supreme being by experience he can certainly outdo any Freethinker I ever knew.

He makes out that Freethinkers worship Nature. I do not know what he means by worship. I respect nature as I do the butcher, the baker, and the spring that supplies me with water—for what it is, no more and no less. And I fail to see any worship in that.

But I would like to know what experience he has had (he a Freethinker) that helps to prove the existence of a supreme being.

The climax of absurdity is not yet. It comes when Mr. Chapman tries to prove God by history. Indeed, if history could be trusted there would be no trouble in proving any quantity of Gods. But the question is: Is history all true? Is it not the duty of a Freethinker to weigh it in his own intellectual scale—to parboil it in the crucible of his own judgment? History and the Bible tell us that Moses turned his cane into a snake by the power of God, and that Pharaoh's magicians did the same thing by a simple sleight-of-hand, but what Freethinker believes that Moses's claim was true? We know that in the American war both armies prayed God for assistance, but who knows that they were not both praying to empty space? Possibly Mr. Chapman intended to show by history that the belief in God is innate in man, but who knows that it is? Why could it not be invented by kings and priests to help them subdue the people? Again, what if it is innate in man, does that prove anything? An old African king would not believe that Stanley could charm him back into a young man again if he wished. Is Mr. Chapman prepared to believe Mr. Stanley a wizard because a savage did? Savages always did and always will believe in witchcraft, while the belief has entirely vanished from the mind of civilized man. If innate belief proves nothing in the case of witchcraft, why does it prove so much in the case of deity? Is not the weakness and ignorance of savages, stimulated by hope and fear, sufficient to induce a belief in God, devil, spooks, ghosts, and all the other supernatural fancies?

Another queer idea of Mr. Chapman's—he says man annihilates God and deifies himself to take the place, and to show what a sorry figure man makes on the divine throne he enumerates the unjust and cruel deeds of man recorded in history, seemingly to show that man is too cruel and wicked to be deified, overlooking the fact that if there is a God who is responsible for everything that is, the same bad record must apply to him. Furthermore, he forgot that man enacted all of this villainy in the name of God and thinking he was doing God's will, and has ceased doing so only in proportion as he has ceased to believe in that infamous God. If Mr. Chapman objects that man was mistaken in his belief that God instructed him to commit such evils, then what becomes of his historical proof of deity? Supposing he claims that God is better than was supposed by the poor deluded man who committed murders and other evils in his name. I say such a God cannot be. Any man's experience ought to be sufficient to convince one of sound judgment that there is no supreme being outside of nature, or if there is that he does nothing good but what nature could do without him, and is at the same time to blame for all the evil that exists, since he is almighty and either causes it or suffers it to be caused. Mr. Chapman expatiates greatly on man's inhumanity to man, blaming him for all the wicked and cruel crimes that were ever committed. Yet he believes there is a supreme being and never asks him where he is and what he is doing that he does not interfere. Well, if that God does exist he is wise in not interfering with the misdeeds of man, lest his weapon might be turned back against himself. Man is inhuman to man when he must be in order to acquire the fortune, rank, and affluence he wishes to enjoy. But does not God do the same himself? When he has a surplus of water does he mind drowning a few thousand people to store it away? When he gets jolly enough to display fireworks, is he mindful as to what good man, his horse or his cow, the rockets may hit? No, not at all; he fires away in all directions regardless of consequences. He does just what nature would do if he was not there at all—lets nature take its course and effect follow cause.

At last Mr. Chapman makes a grand display of good sounding phrases, out of which I can only make out that a supreme ruler is desirable. Well, I confess I would like myself to see a good, wise, kind, and honest god, but I have not yet been fortunate enough to find such a god. Mr. Chapman is trying to manufacture one of his strong desire, a thing I cannot do. Mine must exist without the help of my desire or imagination, and the only means I have to recognize him is by his works.

A Trip to Arizona.

I had a trip last week to a part of Arizona which it may interest readers of the Corner to hear of. This is the Verde river valley. The river has its source in the highest of our mountains, the San Francisco range, fourteen thousand feet above the sea-level. This Rio Verde, explored and mapped by Francisco Colorado and his daring adventurers early in the Spanish conquest, flows southwest through a series of long narrow valleys and pours its waters into Salt river.

I say a series of valleys, for the high mountains that border the stream sometimes shut in till the river flows through a narrow box canyon, then they open out again and a narrow valley is seen. There are three of these valleys—upper, middle, and lower Verde—and they all have a small population of farmers. But it is not for the people who now farm the valleys that they are noteworthy, but for the fact that they contain some of the best-preserved ruins of the race that once peopled the country west of the Rocky mountains.

The ruins consist of cliff-dwellings, tilled fields, great stone dams, and an intricate system of ditches for the purpose of irrigation. All crops must be watered artificially in this section, and these forgotten people made use of more land than the irrigation schemes of our government can hope to redeem in a century. Immense canals may be traced, and farms laid out in small beds are yet to be seen. There is no doubt that all this barren land was once the home of a numerous and, comparatively speaking, highly civilized people. The lower valley is the most interesting and the most difficult to reach. The only entrance for wagons is through Copper canyon. I wish I had the power to picture it as I saw it. It looked to me as if some giant force had torn the grim, black mountains apart to make this wild and impressive gateway.

The canyon is six miles long and often three thousand feet deep from the top of the mountains to the bed of the gorge. The wagon road, in many places blasted out of the solid rock, winds in and out down the sides of this awful place. On the right hand going down, tower gigantic cliffs of white limestone, half hidden in a coat of dark piñon pine and tangled underbrush. They look cool and stately and solemn. On the left the mountain is a mass of lava, piled in fantastic shapes and covered with a scant growth of cactus and stunted cedar and juniper trees. The lava is in many shades of brown and red, and along the very top of the mountain is piled in huge blocks almost as evenly laid as masonry. So noticeable is this that one can readily fancy one's self looking at the stronghold of a feudal baron.

The canyon is nowhere more than three or four thousand feet across. Sometimes, riding in the wagon, we could lean out and touch the cliffs that rose overhead, while on the other side, not six feet from the road, the ravine dropped down many hundred feet with scarce a break. Tops of tall trees growing in the bed of the canyon were far below us. Here and there tall spurs of rock and masses of lava masquerade in strange shapes. One showed the face of a man with an enormous nose and wearing a peaked cap. Others look like crouching animals. Above us on the left wound the old military road built by General Crook nearly thirty years ago, when the Apache was "lord of the land," and lower down mounds dotted here and there show that many a trooper fell under the fire of the hidden enemy before the work was done.

The cliffs above were most admirable places for ambush. There is a tiny stream of water in the canyon, and thickets of ash and ghostly-looking sycamore trees.

Three miles from the mouth of the canyon is Camp Verde, a military post now abandoned. It is the "Camp Sandy" of Capt. Charles King's military novel, "The Colonel's Daughter." This story describes quite accurately that part of Arizona lying between Prescott and the Verde river.

A few miles south of the fort rises a magnificent peak, probably six thousand feet high. It is called Squaw peak and on its very summit a desperate battle was fought between the United States troops and the Apache Indians. The valley is a veritable wonderland in look and history. On the west bank of the river the valley is from two to four miles wide, then come low salt hills. At one point there is a valuable salt mine. Back of this rise great brown and red peaks, the top of the mountain wall which shuts in the valley. On the east comes first a narrow strip of valley, then low hills of white lime, looking very barren and dreary and desolate; then high peaks of red clay. To the north are the gorgeous reds and yellows of the "Red Rock Country," once the favorite lurking-place of the Apaches, and a land wondrously rich in ancient ruins.

My visit was very short, but I found time to visit an ancient dam uncovered by recent high floods. Two years ago the river ran half a mile from the spot and the dam was buried under at least ten feet of solid earth. After a period of heavy floods the river turned and cut the earth away back to this ancient channel, uncovered the dam it had long ago buried, and now flows where it did in the long-forgotten days when this valley must have been the garden-spot of northern Arizona. The dam is built of large rocks in front, with a mass of small stones back of them, and will compare very favorably with the work of the present day. It is about two hundred feet long. We could trace clearly the point where the ditch left the dam, and long stretches of similar ditch are to be found elsewhere in the valley. To all appearances the ditches have had a lining of clay similar to that used in making the ancient pottery. Some pottery and stone implements are occasionally found in the valley—and one stone ax with the handle attached was found last year in a cave a few miles up the river.

With good wishes for all readers of the Corner, I am, Yours respectfully, Prescott, Ariz. SHARLOT M. HALL.

Correspondence.

McMINNVILLE, ORE., Dec. 18, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, My Dear Friend:
I again take the pleasure of writing to you and the little Corner friends, as it has been a long time since I have written to the Corner.

Well, I am glad you arrived home in good health from your foreign travel. Your letters about your trip were very interesting indeed. I missed the Corner very much while you were away off in Europe, but I am very glad you enjoyed your visit. By what you said in your letter you did not get seasick during your trip. I am very much afraid that if I were to start on so long a voyage I should get seasick. Well, we have had a rather nice winter; we had lots of rain in the early autumn, and on Thanksgiving day the snow was about four inches deep in the morning, but it melted off before night. Well, Christmas is coming; it soon will be here, the very best time of all the year. I do not hear much talk about having Christmas entertainments around here. I have received two presents. We are not going to school now. School closed the 28th of October and will not start till spring. I did not get my letter finished last night, so will finish to-night. It has been snowing all day to-day; the snow is two or three inches deep. Lots of snow falls almost every winter here and we have a good time riding snowshoes. I think it is very pretty to see everything covered with snow, as it is now, especially the evergreen fir-trees. They are so large and tall; some of them are three hundred feet high. In the winter time the grouse stay in the fir timber all the time and live by eating the leaves. They are very pretty birds and are nice to eat.

We still take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I guess we will continue to take it. I hope so anyway, for I think it is the best paper there is. I think Mr. Heston is truly a genius, for the pictures are just fine; they are worth one-third of the paper nearly. We have saved every one of them in taking the paper two years, and expect to keep all the rest.

Eliza said she would not write this time, and as my letter is becoming very long I guess I will close, hoping this will not find its way to that dreadful waste-basket and fearing it will take up too much valuable space. Your Liberal friend, LOU VINA FARMER.

CROMWELL, IA., Dec. 28, 1892.

TO THE READERS OF THE CORNER: I was reading a little in THE TRUTH SEEKER to-day, and a desire seized me to write to the Corner once more. I seldom resist such temptations.

Prof. W. S. Bell gave an interesting address at Creston last month and spent a few days at our home. I presume you all have seen an account of it in THE TRUTH SEEKER or the Investigator. He acquaints you with almost all that transpired, so there is little left for me to tell. However, I wish to extend my thanks to him for his complimentary remarks and also to inform the readers that you will always regret it if you do not have Mr. Bell stop with you when it would be possible for him to do so. He can keep a house in uproarious laughter hour after hour.

Mr. Franklin Steiner also lectured at Creston on the 18th inst. His lecture was splendid and was appreciated by all present. I am lending THE TRUTH SEEKER to a friend, and am doing all I can to make "full-feathered Liberals" of a family of six. I think the wings are started, and with the help of a few more such educators as Messrs. Bell and Steiner will grow rapidly.

I noticed a letter from Lura M. Fenton in the Children's Corner in which she says she would like to hear if some of the young Freethinkers have to draw maps. I am glad that I can answer Miss Fenton's question. I have attended school up to the present time, and of all my duties at school, map-drawing and philosophy were my favorites. I have Shakspeare's complete works, which I received as first prize for drawing a map of my own state. I have numerous maps drawn when I studied physical geography, which are colored, not with crayon, but with inks.

I think if you would get Diamond dyes, and make inks for coloring maps, you would like it much better. Above all, keep your maps. In future years they will be a great source of pleasure to you; at least, I find it so. I read a sketch in THE TRUTH SEEKER to-day which made the blood rush angrily through my body. It was of the attempted murder of M. W. St. John. I sincerely hope that the would-be murderer may be brought to justice and the most severe punishment inflicted. Wishing Mr. St. John a long life set with gems of peace and happiness, I am,

Yours truly, MINNIE W. GEIER.

1 Christians and Mohammedans.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 333 pages. This is beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly calendered, and richly tinted, the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published work, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fiske, Eliza Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," Love, Liberty, Art and Morality, Science, Nature, The Imagination, Decoration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny, "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual Liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

Prices.—In cloth, beveled boards, gilt edges, $2.50; in half morocco, gilt edges, $5; in half calf, mottled edges, library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible finish, $9.

Any of the above sent to any address, by express, prepaid, or mail, post free, on receipt of price. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject. In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stipendiature; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attentions at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. Gems of Thought.

PRESENTED rightly to the mind, the discoveries and generalizations of modern science constitute a poem more sublime than has yet been addressed to the intellect and imagination of man.—Tyndall.

FEEL neither aversion nor disdain toward those whose minds are deficient; expect not men to be perfect in all respects. To conceal the faults of others, and publish their virtues . . . this is the way to make ourselves beloved.—Chinese author.

WHY should not a man be as free to say that he does not believe as to say that he does believe? Perhaps the real question is whether all men have an equal right to express their opinions. Is it the duty of the minority to keep silent? Are majorities always right? If the minority had never spoken, what to-day would have been the condition of this world? Are the majority the pioneers of progress, or does the pioneer, as a rule, walk alone?—Ingersoll.

WHATEVER is both honest and advantageous is proper and becoming, and we are attached to virtue because it includes both these qualities. Virtue is an ornament that sets off the whole person of him who possesses it—his exterior and his interior. To the mind it communicates inexpressible beauties and perfections. To the body it produces delightful sensations.

It is the property of virtue to calm the heart and preserve peace there, so this inward tranquillity and secret joy produce a certain serenity in the countenance, an air of goodness, kindness, and consideration which attracts everyone's esteem.—Confucius.

WHY can we not oftener refresh one another with original thoughts? If the fragrance of the Dicksonia fern is so grateful and suggestiv to us, how much more refreshing and encouraging, recreating, would be fresh and fragrant thoughts communicated to us from a man's experience. I want none of his pity nor sympathy in the common sense, but that he should emit and communicate to me his essential fragrance, that he should not be forever repenting and going to church (when not otherwise sinning), but as it were going a-huckleberrying in the fields of thought, and enriching all the world with his visions and his joys.—Thoreau.

SOULS communicate with souls, and can measure one another without need of an intermediate body. It is only the greatness or the worth of a soul that ought to frighten or intimidate us. To fear or to respect the body and its accessories—force, beauty, royalty, rank, office—is pure imbecility. Men are born equal and die equal. Let us respect the virtue, the merit of their souls, and despise the imperfections of those souls. Doubtless we should by prudence avoid the evil which that physical force can do us, as we should guard ourselves against a crowned bull, an enthroned monkey, a savage dog let loose upon us. Let us beware of such. Let us even endeavor, if possible, to moderate them, to soften them; but this sentiment is very different from the esteem and respect which we owe to souls. By having it well at heart that men are equal, and clearly in the head that externals distinguish them, one can get on very well in the world.—Voltaire.

THE central idea of Secularism is attention to this world, on the ground that it is the only world that we know anything about. Attention is the synonym for remedy. When an evil is perceived, the spontaneous remark of everyone is—that affair needs attention. If the people of Toronto want their city to excel all others in attractiveness and comfort they must attend to Toronto rather than to Timbuctoo; and if we want the world to grow better we must think of earth rather than of heaven. There is no greater enemy of progress than the religion which teaches people, who have come to live seventy years in a place, that they have "no abiding city" there, that their abode is cursed, that they must not try to improve it, but should live in self-denial, hoping for "a city yet to come," "a home beyond the skies." Secularism tells people that it is worth while to be happy even for seventy years, and that they should do the best for themselves and their neighbors with the means at hand, no matter whether there is another life or not. If men gave up yearning for heaven and set to work in good earnest to improve the condition of mankind, through the knowledge of nature's laws and wise application of her forces, possibly life in time would become so prolonged that men would cease to consider the question of future existence as "the chief concern of mortals here below."—Robt. C. Adams.

Astronomy and Design.

We will continue our presentation of the evidence that the facts of astronomy do not indicate an intelligent designer.

We were pointing out of each class of heavenly bodies in turn that it is either useless or injurious to man. The only class that remains is the meteorites, or aerolites, or shooting-stars (though the term shooting-stars is applied differently by some). The species of bodies known by these names is perhaps more hostile than any other to the hypothesis that the universe was got up for man's use. For the action of these bodies represents the creator engaged in throwing stones at his own handiwork. These bodies consist of lumps of stone or metal continually dashing against the earth in profuse numbers. They are various in bulk, some being no bigger than a pea and others being large masses of several tons' weight. The scriptural text of Josh. x, 11, is supposed to be an account of one of these phenomena, dressed up in the legendary garb which invests all narratives of those times. The historian Pliny describes a stone which fell near Ægospotamus in Thrace 467 B.C.; it was as large as a cart. At Mecca there is preserved a celebrated meteorite called Hajar el Aswad, the Black Stone; upon its arrival at our well-meaning but not over-intelligent sphere it was pronounced a sacred thing from the gods, and has ever since been an object of worship by the Mohammedans. Some think that the object called in our translation of Acts xix, 35, an "image," which was worshiped by the Ephesians, also was an aerolite. In number these objects are countless. Kepler said that the heavens are "as full of comets as the sea is of fishes;" and these meteorites or aerolites are yet more numerous. Thick showers of them now and then fall in limited areas, they being in such cases of the smallness of hailstones, or sometimes a mere powder—reduced to this state, it is supposed, by the friction of the air of our earth. They are believed to be attended with envelopes of fiery gas until deprived of them by our atmosphere. Thus they are scarcely distinguishable from comets; and it has been proposed to merge the two classes in one. Each year a shower of these meteorites is seen by all of us on the nights of August 9th and November 14th. The fall at L'Aigle, France, April 26, 1803, is one of the best-known ones; it occurred about 1 o'clock in the daytime, and it is estimated that from two to three thousand stones fell, of which the largest found was seventeen and one-half pounds in weight. To give an idea of the phenomena accompanying the fall of these bodies, we shall furnish a short statement of those connected with the fall at L'Aigle, and that in Guernsey county, Ohio, in 1860. At the time of the fall of the L'Aigle meteorite the atmosphere was clear and calm, and many persons observed a brilliant fiery ball passing rapidly through the atmosphere; and a few moments after there was heard a violent explosion, or rather succession of explosions, lasting five or six minutes, the first two or three sounds resembling those of cannon, and subsequent ones those of musketry, then a rumbling noise like the beating of a drum; all these noises being produced by the original explosions and subsequent reverberations. The noise appeared to proceed from a small rectangular cloud, parts of which from time to time were thrown off by the successive explosions; the noises were heard in an area of over one hundred miles, and the area over which the stones fell was about six miles long by three miles broad. In the Guernsey fall we have no definite account of the meteorite during its flight through the atmosphere. This occurred also in the daytime, a little after 1 o'clock, when three or four distinct explosions were heard, like the firing of heavy cannon, with the interval of a second or two after each report. This was followed by sounds like the firing of musketry in quick succession; which ended with a rumbling noise like distant thunder; and this continued two or three minutes. The first reports were so heavy as to produce a tremulous motion like heavy thunder, causing the glass in the windows to rattle; the sound was so singular that it caused excitement and alarm, many supposing it an earthquake. The number of stones that fell must have exceeded one hundred; there were about twenty-eight of them discovered, the largest weighing over three hundred pounds. The stones as they passed near observers were heard to emit a buzzing sound. Now, these projectiles for which our unoffending earth is perpetually made a target are signally out of place in any system of worlds manufactured by an omnipotent creator for the use of man. They are, viewed in any such connection, as useless as anything that can be imagined. And besides, in the course of the long ages past one of them, it may be inferred, must have hit somebody or other, in which case—unless, of course, the luckless individual was some Atheist engaged in denying his creator—the glory of God as shown in his care for his creatures must have been anything but augmented.

Then, too, some of the notions as to the origin of these meteorites are sadly discreditable to an imputed governor of these affairs. Meunier, who has made a special study of them, says: "Putting all hypotheses on one side, it appears that the meteorites are derived from some planet, now in a state of disaggregation, of which they form the débris." To Theists, the falling apart of one of these pieces of work of that individual whom they style the Great Artificer and vouch for as possessing a thorough journeyman skill at all of his various crafts, must needs be a disagreeable occurrence. This bad is made worse by the bothersome thing not only falling to pieces but falling on us. A carpenter who should present his sons with a house one part of which should fall in on them would not be accounted to possess much skill. M. Le Verrier and M. Schiaparelli advance a theory which is yet more disquieting. They believe that aerolites originate in the disruption not merely of a planet of our system, but in that of masses much vaster in some of the other world-systems which throng space, whence they are thrown into our vicinity, and gradually broken up more or less by the influence of our sun. The situation in which our earth is placed, amid such terrific operations, is anything but what could be desired.

We will turn to other features of the matter.

Such correspondences of human activities to the earth's conditions as do exist, were formerly reckoned the results of a designed creation of those conditions in just such shape as to suit those human activities. But we now have learned that the case is the opposite—the earth was not fitted to man, but man has gradually grown fitted to the earth. We will give one instance. The sun does not absent itself during the night because man wants to rest, but man rests because the sun is absent. If animals had chanced to arise on a world always lit, it is supposable that they would have remained awake continuously. Indeed, a creator designing night for men's repose would not have broken its gloom by the moon's light. And he would not have slighted the respectable residents of the Arctic zone by putting off on them any such by-products of his workshop as days six months in length and nights of the same absurd elongation.

In a similar line of thinking, Büchner remarks:

"In the well-known inclination of the axis of the earth toward the plane of its orbit, known by the name of the angle of the ecliptic, which is the cause of the change of the seasons, many perceive a design of heaven intended for our welfare. But they do not consider that they are confounding effect and cause, and that our organization would most probably be different were the inclination of the ecliptic different or non-existent. Besides, this very angle of the ecliptic, the object of such mistaken praise, does not even seem to be in any way conducive to our advantage; and if it were in our power to change this slope of the axis of the earth toward the plane of the earth's orbit, we should most certainly do it and thereby bring about a greater equality in the seasons. For if the earth's axis were perpendicular to its orbit, there would be in our latitude, for instance, a perpetual spring, calculated in all probability to lengthen human life."

An "equality in the seasons," which Buchner here speaks of, is indeed to be desired. The extraordinary heat of last summer in many neighborhoods killed off the children like flies, as well as numerous adults; and at the time of writing a cold wave of equal extremeness is paralyzing industry and destroying unnumbered lives. Meteorologists, we learn, having searched for the cause of these two excesses of temperature among conditions originating on the earth, are now imputing both of them to a disturbance and over-issue of heat last summer in that body so admired by the advocates of design—the sun. To the design-believers this fault-finding with what they account the very chief of God's provisions for our good we suppose must seem nothing short of blasphemy. Notwithstanding, these meteorological investigators go on to conjecture that our earth's equatorial regions grew so hot last summer that they are still unusually warm, and hence the air over them, becoming heated and thus lighter, is continually rising, and to fill its place a current sets in from our neighborhood and brings the icy air of the pole sweeping down over us.

Favorers of design notice only the good things that befall us, and ignore the bad. To arrive at a correct estimate in the matter, we should not devote ourselves entirely to considering how good is any helpful happening, but think in regard to each, how much better it might have been. The conditions under which human life has been evolved by the solar system and this earth fall far behind our wishes on every hand. There is, to be sure, a promising outlook for the future; we will not deny that the progress made by man since he has begun to break away from devotion to a God and direct more of his service to himself, renders reasonable an expectation of a very pleasant future some generations hence. And at present man's condition is somewhat ameliorated. But the misery suffered by the misguided generations who have led to this was fearful, and remains sealed and unrecompensed. And indeed the present has not become so vastly mildened; to-day we can only by means of often very uncomfortable travail and turmoil force our brief way through life impeded by such obstacles as drouth, cold, cholera, and Theists.

In our next issue we shall conclude our treatment of Astronomy and Design, and be set at liberty to consider certain other arguments for the existence of a God.

The World's Fair on Sunday.

There is little news from Washington regarding the Sunday opening of the World's Fair. The committee having the matter in charge have not at this writing reported their conclusion to the House. Mr. Putnam is laboring with the representatives—lobbying, as it were—for our side, and the fanatics are lobbying on the other. They have the advantage of numbers and popular prejudice, but Mr. Putnam has with him the material interests of Chicago and the state of Illinois, and that would even things up somewhat if it were not for the cowardice of the "statesmen" who make our laws. The duty of Liberals is still to write to these men and endeavor to infuse them with a little courage. A large number of them are in reason and sentiment in favor of a Liberal policy, and if they find a considerable number of their constituents urging Sunday opening they may possibly give expression to their views in their voting. Therefore, write to them, write at once, and get all Liberal-minded people to write.

We will add that the newspapers contain statements that intimates of President Harrison have been informed by him that he is resolved to veto any bill for Sunday opening that reaches him.

Among the press of the country, nearly all the organs of free and really intelligent opinion advocate opening. Representative papers in all the states, even those journals usually conservative, do so. Such are the Des Moines State Register, the Topeka Capital, and the Augusta, Me., Kennebec Journal. This latter, for instance—a typical New England newspaper—calls attention to the fact that the most zealous advocates of Sunday closing are the saloon-keepers and dive-keepers, who expect to reap a golden harvest if the gates are closed; that the army of workingmen and women within a few hours' reach of the grounds ought not to be denied the opportunity to enjoy their weekly holiday in so educating and elevating a place, and so on. The New York Post, a journal commanding considerable influence by its high level of intelligence and its just judgments, very correctly says:

"The whole argument for opening the Chicago Fair on Sunday is simply the same argument that has been indorsed by public sentiment wherever it has been put in practice on a smaller scale. The opening of the Metropolitan Museum in Central park disturbs no New Yorker who prefers to spend the whole of Sunday in religious worship or meditation, or who considers it a sin to gaze upon a work of art on Sunday. All that such a person has to do to avoid contamination is to stay away. In like manner, the visitor to Chicago who wants to spend the day in church-going or in religious reading in his room will not be annoyed by those whose tastes lead them to prefer other employment of their time. In fact, it would be hard to imagine a method whereby those who differ in their views as to the best way of spending Sunday can be more easily accommodated than by opening the grounds for those who choose to enter. Nobody proposes to require any person to visit the Exposition on that day, so that no one who has conscientious scruples against so doing will need to violate them—nor, indeed, to see them violated by others. On the other hand, nobody who considers a visit to the grounds the most profitable way of spending the day will be prevented from following his predilections. The Sabbatarian will not be driven into the Exposition against his will, and the Liberal will not be barred out of it against his will. Each class will spend the day as it thinks wisest, and neither will disturb the other."

There is more than enough due us on subscriptions to make our financial affairs easy, if it could only be sent us. And we hope these friends will make an extra effort to do this. We so dislike to make appeals of this kind that our readers may know that when we do, it is a matter of pressing necessity, and they can shape their actions accordingly.

The catalog of those blessed places which possess Holy Coats of Jesus has now swelled to these proportions: Loecum in Hanover, Safed near Jerusalem, Santiago, Oviedo, Mayence, Ghent, Mantua, Mallorca, Halle, Cologne, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Friaul, Moscow, and the Lateran in Rome. Present-day carpenters, of one week-day coat and one go-to-meeting one, can scarce choose but swell with envy.

The Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal delivers the following utterance without a blush: "The Declaration of Independence acknowledges that the rights it proclaims come from God as the source of all government and all authority. This is a fundamental religious principle in which church and state meet. From it follows the correlativ principle that as God alone is the source of human rights, so God alone can efficaciously maintain them." The feelings evoked by perusing this pass the point where laughter can come in to relieve, and the adventurous explorer of Catholic journals can only turn away with a stricken, flabbergasted stare.

A New Hampshire man whose wife became a believer in Christian Science and so worried him about it that he became "moody, morose, reticent," and neglected his business, has obtained a divorce on the ground of "extreme cruelty." We think this judicial decision wise enough. The treatment recited meets our conception of the extremest cruelty inflictible. Many a Liberal is all too aware that possession by a wife merely of a belief in plain Christianity, without the addition of Christian Science, is, if said belief be able-bodied and in good fighting condition, cause quite adequate for divorce or a start on exploration of the wilds of Africa.

The relations between the Vatican and the Brazilian government are so strained that a rupture is imminent. The pope, it is said, has intimated that he will excommunicate the president, his cabinet, and the members of the Brazilian congress unless measures are taken to renew the former relations between church and state in Brazil. The Vatican has received numerous complaints from the Brazilian clergy of the disastrous effect upon church interests of the policy of separation adopted by the republic. It is said that many churches are without pastors, and the seminaries are being deserted because the government refuses to continue contributions for the maintenance of the clergy and of chairs in the seminaries. The prelates and priests are still nominally in receipt of salaries from the federal treasury, but when a bishop or priest retires or dies the salary is not continued to his successor, so that the death of a priest means the cessation of salary to his charge, and perhaps the closing of a church. We are thankful whenever we find a country where the people are not fools enough to support priests any longer than they are compelled to. Would that the people of the United States would follow suit.

The Poles of New York city are indignant at one Dr. Lewandowski, whom they charge with playing upon their religious proclivities to effect a real estate swindle over at Castle Hill, N. J. They say that this Dr. Lewandowski, after considerable agitation, induced a large crowd of Poles to join a picnic to Castle Hill. When they got out there the doctor said he would like to found a Polish colony there. After he had got the people worked up to a high pitch of enthusiasm by his patriotic words he turned to them and said: "You have but to dig a few feet and get the best of water." A shovel was quickly secured and a man began digging in the ground. He had uncovered but a few feet of earth when the shovel struck something hard. The people collected around when the object was found to be a picture of the Virgin Mary. When the people saw the picture they cried out: "A miracle! A miracle!" The doctor then had no difficulty in selling lots to these enthusiastic Catholics. He sold eighty of them at prices ranging from $125 to $200. Shortly afterward the real estate boom fell flat, it being found that the doctor had no title to the land and the people had lost their money. But this is a trivial imposition upon these people's superstitions, in comparison with the course of like swindling which has been practiced for centuries by state-authorized Lewandowskis in gown and band.

The new lectures by Colonel Ingersoll are not yet in print in pamphlet form, and may not be until Mr. Farrell publishes new editions of his books. We have a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER returned from newsdealers containing the lecture on Voltaire, but even that supply is very limited. What we have, however, will be sent to early purchasers—14 cents for the two numbers.

With Our Congressmen.

News and Notes.

After listening to floods of orthodox bellicose appeals during the past week it was an exquisite pleasure to begin the new week with the charming contrast of Ingersoll's lecture on Voltaire. The house was crowded to its utmost capacity and the words of the orator were greeted with continuous applause by the brilliant assembly. It was an ovation to the still vigorous and splendid eloquence of the Iconoclast. The dramatic fire has not grown less, and the voice has its old-time ring and melody and thrills with the intensity of thought. What a picture of Voltaire was unrolled in glittering periods, with wealth of imagination, pathos, and sublimity, and sparkling humor like the glorious summer's sunshine itself. How the shafts of ridicule, winged with poetic fervor, pierced the church, the Bible, the priesthood, and the God of inhumanity. It was the splendor of the past giving prophetic glory to the future, which fills the heart with hope.

I really needed such an inspiration for the arduous work which lies before the reformer in the halls of Congress. Almost like the gloomy solemnity of a church towers our mighty Capitol. The hand of the priest is upon it and the cross is above the flag. Will the tyranny of the past make the New World as bloody as the Old?

I think we are at a turning-point in the history of this republic. If ecclesiastical power triumphs now, there must be another revolution before the flag of liberty can float in peace and security.

It is not simply the question of the World's Fair, but of universal and permanent principles. It is a question whether this shall be a government of the people or a government of Congress and priest above the people. Right before our eyes a vast usurpation is going on, to which the American people seem to be utterly indifferent, not realizing that we are drifting into a church tyranny, but also into a political tyranny that one day can only be overthrown by the most stupendous efforts and by blood itself. What tyranny is so terrible as that of an irresponsible body like Congress? Read the history of the French convention which sent Paine to prison and almost guillotined him and we shall behold the threatened invader of our liberties to-day.

The very fact that the religious and Christian friends of Sunday opening did not question the unconstitutionality of a Congressional enactment, but relied upon the impolicy and inexpediency of the legislations, demonstrates the short-sightedness even of professed Liberals to the dangers of the situation. The whole battle for Sunday opening should have been fought along Constitutional lines. In no other way is victory possible. But it was declared to be an insult to Congress to attack any legislation on the ground of unconstitutionality. So it seems that we are to regard Congress as infallible on constitutional questions, like unto the pope on theological questions—a most absurd proposition.

The tendency in Congress is to the abrogation of the Constitution. One member affirms that Congress is above the Constitution. His reasoning is as follows. The Constitution was made by the people. The people can unmake it. Congress represents the people. Therefore Congress can unmake the Constitution at any time, and transcend the Constitution in its legislation. This is a true statement of Congressional opinion for which I can vouch. Does it not sound truly Pickwickian?

Another Congressman says, I give his very words: "Damn the Constitution. We pass an act. If the people approve it, the Supreme Court will declare it constitutional. If the people do not approve it, the Supreme Court will declare it unconstitutional, and that ends the matter." According to this Congress, the Supreme Court and the people are not to regard the Constitution. There is to be an irresponsible majority rule. The legislation of Congress on the World's Fair is an index of the prevalence of these sentiments in Congress. It will be seen that the conflict for personal liberty in this country is far deeper than any question about the World's Fair. The very nature of republican institutions is being tried to-day as never before. Are all constitutional safeguards to be overthrown by the mere arbitrary will of the people? The Constitution is for the benefit of the minority, not of the majority. A majority needs no constitution to maintain its rights, but the minority does, and the Constitution was established for that purpose, to defend in all cases the rights of the minority, even if that minority is only one. It seems, however, that Congress is to ignore the Constitution and substitute in its place "majority rule." Save us from a despotism like that. Better the tyranny of one man than that of an irresponsible multitude. Yet we are coming right into this far-reaching and desperate tyranny under the forms of a republican government. It is this enormous danger to all free institutions that the Liberals of this country must thoroughly understand, and they must be prepared for a long and tremendous contest. Until I came to Washington I did not realize the depth and peril of this movement to unconstitutional and arbitrary legislation. I know it now, and the struggle for political liberty is immeasurably increased. If we could appeal to the Constitution, we could easily dispose of the World's Fair and religious enactments; but when that bulwark is denied, where are we, what can we depend upon?

Notice a remark made by a member of the Columbian Exposition committee. I heard him make it myself, and was simply astonished at the assumption. He said: "You have no constitutional right to forbid a man to go into a saloon, but if you give him $5 with the understanding that if he accepts the money he shall not go in, then if he accepts you have a constitutional right to forbid him to go into the saloon." Can the force of artificial logic go any further? No cat has nine tails, but one cat has one more tail than no cat. Therefore one cat has ten tails. That's the logic of words minus ideas. It is assumed that by purchase Congress can acquire an unconstitutional power. The closing of the World's Fair on Sunday is in itself unconstitutional, without any conditions whatever, as treason is unconstitutional. Can Congress purchase a right to make treason unconstitutional? Can I by giving a man $5 acquire the right to compel him to steal? If I hire a man to stay out of a saloon, he stays out willingly. But have I a right to give a man $5 and then draw a club and force him to stay out of a saloon? Oh, what wise legislators we have! For $5 I can acquire the exquisite privilege of knocking a man down.

The heart of the people is right yet, and to the people we must appeal. The most applauded passage in all of Ingersoll's magnificent oration was, "The use, and the only use, of any government is the preservation of human liberty." It was like the thunder of the waves of the sea the greeting of that splendid sentiment by the vast assembly. As long as we have an Ingersoll I guess we can regenerate even Congress itself with the fire of the people's thought.

It was the convention that imprisoned Paine, and murdered noble men and women during the French Revolution, the convention that refused to give a constitution to the people of France. We are in danger to-day of the tyranny of a Congress without a Constitution, and the irresponsible dictatorship of a Murat and Robespierre. From that fearful time, from the shadow of death, comes the voice of Paine himself, with political wisdom for the combat of to-day. He writes to the French people:

Had a Constitution been established two years ago, as ought to have been done, the violence that has since desolated France and injured the character of the Revolution, would, in my opinion, have been prevented. The nation would have had a bond of union and every individual would have known the line of conduct he was to follow. But instead of this, a revolutionary government, a thing without either principle or authority, was substituted in its place. Virtue or crime depended upon accidents, and that which was patriotism one day became treason the next. All these things have followed the want of a constitution; for it is the nature and intention of a constitution to prevent governing by party, by establishing a common principle that shall limit and control the power and impulse of that party, and that says to all parties, Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther. But in the absence of a constitution men look entirely to party; and instead of principle governing party, party governs principle.

How applicable are these words to the situation of to-day. France went from the convention to the constitution on the path of progress. It seems as if we were going from the constitution to the "convention" on the way of retrogression. Read Conway's "Life of Paine," and the importance of this point will be seen.

Only think of it, before the House committee last week, the Rev. Mr. Jones and myself were the only ones who argued the question on the basis of constitutional rights. Even the friends of Sunday opening abandoned an impregnable position for fear of "insulting" Congress. A great blunder was made, but it only makes the work of Freethought more imperative and important. And think of this also. Dr. Crafts declared before the committee that Dr. Westbrook, ex-president of the American Secular Union, had written the ablest pamphlet on their side of the question, and Dr. Crafts haunted the Investigator in my face, and said that even Liberals were divided on this matter of Sunday opening. I told Dr. Crafts that he was welcome to Dr. Westbrook, for Dr. Westbrook was not a Liberal, nor did he represent a single Liberal in our land, nor was there any division in our ranks on the question of Sunday opening. It was impossible there should be any difference of opinion any more than on the question of church taxation. If a professed Liberal should argue for the exemption of churches from taxation that very argument would show that he was not a Liberal. So he who argues for Sunday closing cannot be a Liberal. I do not question at all the honesty of Dr. Westbrook. I do not doubt that he is true to his own convictions, and from his standpoint he has made an able argument, and the orthodox party uses his argument and scatters it broadcast, but it is simply an abuse of the English language to say that Dr. Westbrook is a Liberal. He joins the orthodox party and enforces his opinions by brute force and rejoices that he has the power of the state to back his convictions against the equally honest convictions of millions of American people. Dr. Westbrook is in the orthodox ranks to-day, and as he is not a "convert" or "pervert" but expresses his life-long belief, then he always was in the orthodox ranks, and as a matter of fact the American Secular Union for three years was under orthodox leadership. We might as well confess the blunder and try not to be so sadly "sold" in the future. Dr. Westbrook denies ecclesiastical legislation, I admit, but he affirms paternal legislation and paternal legislation is in direct opposition to the principles of a purely secular government. Grant paternalism and the church has the logical basis of all its political surveillance. As Huxley says: "Grant the right of the state to supervise a man's breakfast and you grant the right to supervise his religion." Grant the right of the state to close the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday for physiological reasons and you grant the right to close for religious reasons. Scratch paternalism and you find ecclesiasticism every time. To go from the latter to the former is like jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, thoroughly and justly answers the logical basis of Westbrook's argument:

Paternal government is falsehood. It takes the paternal name to sanction its absolute authority, and discards the paternal duty in administering government. It is only a father in name, and is without natural love to mitigate tyranny or to do equal justice among the people. It claims power to rule without restraint, and to dispense blessings or cursings at its will. It has petted parasites attached to itself, that they may feed upon it, and draws the resources with which to supply them from the unfavored and disinherited mass, whom it only exhausts and never helps. It has its foster children and its foundlings, its favorites and its victims, and burdens the many for the benefit of the few.

Understand, I do not attack the motives of Dr. Westbrook. I honor his bravery. I simply define his position. He is orthodox and always has been orthodox, and the history of Liberalism in this country will be better understood when we realize this fact. Liberalism, as I understand it, is not merely good feeling, good nature; it is not slush and gush and sentimental confusion of ideas; it is a well-defined political philosophy, a theory and practice of government, as well as a social and intellectual advancement, and so defined, Dr. Westbrook is and always has been in opposition to that political philosophy. With all my heart I give him to the God-in-the-Constitution party who now welcome him with salvoes of applause.

I have enlarged upon these matters in order that the Liberals of America may understand the great and dangerous tendencies now in legislation, and that the World's Fair business is simply an index of far greater usurpations and violations of human rights in the future, that they may learn as I have learned in the last few weeks that beneath the dome of our Capitol is a vast and silent conspiracy against individual liberty; that the Constitution is looked upon as a thing of the past, no more the conservator of universal freedom. The battle is on us. It is not a question as to whether we shall win or lose. We must fight, even if it is a forlorn hope. We have been absolutely robbed of our liberties, and what can we do but plunge into the conflict? I shall appeal to Congress in every possible way for a reversal of the verdict. As Dr. Thomas says, its legislation is an eternal menace to freedom. If we fail in Congress then we must appeal to the people. The church party has inaugurated a revolution. If revolution is the order of the time—forced upon us by a decaying superstition—let us be prepared to meet it, and maintain our rights at every hazard.

I lectured last Sunday at Baltimore and found some stalwart allies. I shall lecture again next Sunday, and hope to report progress in this conservative city. I shall endeavor to arrange for Freethought meetings both in Washington and Baltimore during February. I look forward with high anticipations to the celebration of Paine's anniversary at Philadelphia and the greeting of old friends, where the Secular flag has waved so grandly and so long.

Science and Progress.

Religious Mementoes.

The Mexican priests are going to build a memorial chapel on the spot where "the first mass was celebrated on the soil of the western continent," and propose to display the portraits and statues of "missionaries who gained the crown of martyrdom in endeavoring to baptize American Indians in the name of Jesus the son of Mary." If our neighbors would exhibit the portraits of the American Indians butchered in the name of that same personage, they would have to build a picture-gallery as long as the Rio Grande del Norte.

Unrewarded Zeal.

The private motif of the czar in continuing the persecution of his Jewish subjects is said to be the desire to propitiate the favor of heaven by suppressing the enemies of the true faith, for the Polish Catholics and the Lutherans of Courland and Finland are likewise harassed within an inch of their lives. Heaven's reply comes in the form of more and more ruinous calamities. Famine has assumed proportions that threaten to baffle the efforts of the relief committees. Cholera has broken out afresh in the southern provinces, and even in some of the larger central cities, though the present winter is the most severe known since 1861, when the farmers of the upper Volga were almost ruined by the destruction of their cattle. Brigandage has spread from the Caucasus to the western border-districts (the Polish provinces), and the investigation of the last conspiracy proves that Nihilism is beginning to make converts among the staff-officers of the imperial army.

Pious Landsharks.

Max O'Rell (Monsieur Blouet) sums up his opinion of Johnnie Bull's political ethics in an anecdote of two Frenchmen who were discussing the temporal rewards of piety. "Take the instance of the religious Britons," said Mr. Huguenot; "the sun does not set upon their territorial possessions." "Yes, I know," said his friend, "he cannot trust the rascals." "But let us be just," adds M. Blouet, "and see if such unprecedented success in the real-estate business is not really founded on superior merit. The Russians, you know, invade the land of their unbelieving neighbors to divert attention from home affairs. The French do the same for glory, but John Bull visits the land of the heathens only to distribute revised copies of the Bible. Then, before long, those heathens have the Bible and John has got their land."

The "Good of It."

A few days ago Willie Cunningham, a boy of ten years, who supports a widowed mother by working in the rolling-mill of Brazil, Ind., lost both eyes by the explosion of a potful of molten iron. His hands, neck, and face, too, were terribly burnt, and this morning I had a conversation with a rough-and-ready laborer of that same rolling-mill who had endeavored, and partly succeeded, to relieve the mother of the unfortunate lad. Only one of the neighbors, a financial and dogmatical pillar of the church, limited his proofs of sympathy to the remark that "we must not lose our trust in the Lord, and there is no saying what good may yet come of it." "The only 'good' he can have had in his mind," said the honest laborer, "is the chance that the boy might die and furnish an opportunity for funeral boodle, for which the preacher would not fail to sue the widow."

The Muses of Golgotha.

Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia" is from a literary point of view so far superior to its orthodox companion-piece, the "Light of the World," that the latter production might almost be suspected of being a secret satire on the creed of its admirers, like Cesar Vanini's "Amphitheatre," intended to ridicule Christianity by the most absurd arguments in favor of its dogmas. But Sir Edwin, perhaps, really did the best he could, under the circumstances. Lord Jeffrey, the semi-skeptical, and wholly candid, editor of the Edinburgh Review, has already called attention to the hopeless mediocrity of orthodox literature. "How is it," he asks, "that we have no church-hymn at all comparable to the productions of secular poetry? Milton had to metamorphose his angels and patriarchs before he could utilize them for epic purposes." Goethe risked a similar comment on Klopstock's "Messiah," and added that "the muses of Golgotha can evidently not compete with their rivals of Mount Parnassus."

Cross and Knout.

The dean of St. Paul and the grand duke Constantine of Russia pronounce in favor of "striking arguments in education," as a witty pedagog expressed it, while the French Freethinker, Floquet, as unhesitatingly commends the plan of substituting the stimulus of ambition for cowhide tonics. "If it had not been for the enthusiasm of competition," he asks, "would there have been Olympic festivals? Would there have been Grecian prize odes, nay, would there have been Grecian civilization?" A majority of his countrymen indorse his protest against the proposed knout-revival, though there are French schoolteachers who regret the decadence of the good old times when the cross and the whipping-post stood side by side, and the proceedings of the parish schools resembled those of a carpet-beating establishment.

Fact vs. Fiction.

An artist of my acquaintance, who recently returned from a trip to Jamaica, describes a most amusing scene on board of a West Indian steamer with a motley crew of Spanish priests and Spanish-Cuban skeptics. "See that double-peaked mountain there?" said the padre José, when the coast of Cuba hove in sight, "that's Pinar del Rio, where our missionaries converted a Cuban chieftain, just four hundred years ago." "Yes, and made away with his wife the next year," whispered Captain Gonzales, who likewise knew a thing or two about the history of his native island. "And that smoke on the right here," continued the padre, "that's San Juan de Felipe, where our people baptized a thousand natives in one day." "Yes, and chased them with bloodhounds when they did not want to work like niggers," muttered the captain in the background. "And over yonder," mused the padre, "there's a gap in the Sierra that reminds me of the Silla de Cobre where we collected a multitude of young men and built a tabernacle school to instruct them in the doctrines of the blessed faith." "Oh, yes," whispered the captain, "and made them believe in hell, anyhow, when they burnt them at the stake," and so on, till the Spanish-speaking passengers were convulsed with laughter—all but the slightly deaf padre, who continued his sentimental reflections with total disregard of the sotto voce comments.

American Candor.

A crusade against Hebrew merchants has broken out in the neighborhood of Jackson, Miss., but the prosecutors are frank enough not to mention such pretexts as the proceedings before the court of Pontius Pilatus. "Those hawknoses," they say, "make $5. for every nickel they spend, and we have no use for them."

Crowned Philosophers.

Under the reign of King Humbert and his Freethinking advisers Italy has progressed at a rate unparalleled during the fourteen centuries of monk-rule. In Austria, too, the most important reforms of feudal abuses were effected by the heretic Kaunitz and his pupil, the emperor Joseph II., whose private theory about the vicar of Christ may be inferred from his letters to the philosopher Aembert and the curious memoirs of the Prince de Ligne. Bernadotte, the adoptive king of Sweden, was a confirmed Agnostic, and the resolute Rationalism of Frederick the Great had more to do with the revival of German literature and science than the Prussian parsons like to admit. "The fact that Kant's 'Critique of Pure Reason' could pass the censor," says Arthur Schopenhauer, "can be explained only by the circumstance that since the time of the Dives Julius and the Dives Julianus" (Cæsar and the Apostate) "it was the first time that a philosopher had mounted a throne of absolute power. But the moment the great king was dead we see Kant seized with dread of his orthodox enemies, and mutilate his masterpiece, or endeavor to explain away its heresies by all sorts of pitiful concessions to the champions of the dominant creed."

Uninspired Prophets.

For the last fourteen days the visionaries of the weather bureau have continued to predict a milder temperature, while the frosts persisted in getting more intense. With all the recent improvements of meteorological apparatus it does not seem to have proved quite easy to find a fit successor to the Freethinker Hazen, who was literally badgered to death for having dared to expose the incompetence of his official superior, a young fellow whose ignorance was equalled only by his vindictiveness in asserting his cheap-bought authority.

LUTHER supported this [meteorological] superstition zealously, asserting at times his belief that the winds themselves are only good or evil spirits, and declaring that he had himself calmed more than twenty storms raised by the devil.—Prof. A. D. White.

THIRD DAY'S MEETING.

Citizen Bourceret, delegate from the French Freethought Federation, presided at this meeting.

The verbal proceedings of the last meeting being approved, numerous letters and telegrams announcing new adhesions were read to the congress.

Citizen Delorme, delegate from the Junior Central Republicans of Madrid, proclaimed the presence of a large Freethought majority of the above body.

Citizen Menéndez Párrés demonstrated the importance of an assembly of Freethinkers in Catholic Spain, the land of Philip II. and of Torquemada. He gave an exposition of Freethought in general, and affirmed that freedom of thought is principally due to thought itself, hence advocated obligatory secular instruction of children. The orator distinguished between freedom of thought and the exercise of this freedom. The first is a result which is not derived from the law, and the exercise and application of Freethought is but little realized so long as we do not live under republican government. Wherever the state has a religion the application of Freethought would be a veritable Utopia. Castelar has said many a time he could not see a single reason which justified a state religion, inasmuch as the state could neither confess nor partake in any communion. The Catholics, intolerant with us, affirm and claim with us Freethinkers the necessity of the exercise of liberty of thought in countries where their dogmas are not officially professed. Therefore, when we can so plainly show their inconsistencies, it is but justice to demand the cessation of their tyranny in Spain. He stated that the separation of church and state was not prejudicial to a parochial clergy; those who were opposed to the separation were the bishops and other high church dignitaries who would thus be deprived of the fat state offices and salaries which they are the recipients of to-day.

Catholicism is opposed to the ethics and thought of modern times; she attempts to reduce the country to six feet of earth in the convent graveyards, in opposition to cosmopolitanism which manifestly is the ruler in modern societies. (Applause.)

Citizen Picart, workingman delegate for Catalogne, said that the enslavement of the laboring classes was due principally to religious tyranny. The church is the greatest criminal. Behold the pope, who, while thousands of people have no shelter, inhabits a building which would give ample accommodation to fifteen hundred families. He said that certain liberties may have been given, but they were of a kind which gave bread to everyone else but the common people—that is, to workingmen, to republicans and Socialists, and these, therefore, ought to unite to conquer for themselves liberty of conscience and liberty of action.

Citizen Llunas, editor of the Tramontana, of Barcelona, speaking of the ways whereby the conscience became perverted through religious prejudices, stated that in his opinion the present popular enlightenment, public education, was not sufficient. It ought to be complete, not a partial education. It should be such as is given in polytechnic schools, where the special faculties of each individual are developed, and through them the exact pointing-out of his future vocation.

He said the penal code needed a revision such as would render criminal any teachings which aimed at a falsification of morality—ethics—and scientific truths.

The Catholic religion is immoral, but said to be promotive of morality because it offers in a future life rewards for being good in this. He next gave an explanation of what constitutes true morality.

Citizen A. Sluys, principal of the normal school in Brussels, said that public education is but a saying, and in most instances a fairy tale. He pointed out in an excellent speech the ideas and the work of complete education, bodily, intellectual, moral, esthetic, and technical, and sounded the truth that all the children of the people had a moral right to a complete education, and it was the duty of the state to guarantee them such. The speech was vigorously applauded.

Citizen Morayta, professor at the University of Madrid, protested against the outrageous legal privileges given to the clergy, the only reason being that they wear the cassock.

THE CLOSING OF THE CONGRESS.

The latter part of the meeting was marked by a characteristic incident. A police sergeant entered and notified the committee and the orators to proceed to the judge's office to receive instructions. They were subjected to a long series of questions. The speeches made at the congress, and all the doings of the same, were laid, nicely written on official and judicial foolscap, on the table before his honor (?). The judge insisted upon two points:

1. Where and when the program of the congress had been published.

(The program had been published for six months in all European languages, and yet the Madrid police officials ignorant!)

2. Injurious attacks had been directed against the Catholic church, which was the state church.

Friday, October 15th, at noon, the numerous delegates presented themselves at the Prince Alphonso Theater to assist in the fourth meeting. The members of the committee were about to take their seats, when a police official appeared, and in the name of the law and the governor of Madrid declared the meetings of the congress suspended.

The public left the theater, and moved through the city, where all stopped opposite the offices of Las Dominicales, where a great ovation took place, closing with the cries of "Long live Freethought!" "Long live the republic!"

Equality: Where?

The planets and stars differ in size, density, color, and attractive and repulsive forces. There is similarity, but no equality, in the astral world, so far as we know. Variation appears to be a law of nature. That law is found operating everywhere. On the earth is seen variety in every department—mineral, floral, and fauna. From its soil comes a vast vocabulary of plants, with their endless shades of difference. Its waters contain marvelous structures of life with bewildering variations. This diversity is witnessed as well in land animals. And evolution is constantly working changes in life organisms—destroying some and improving others; that is, destroying those that will not, or cannot, adapt themselves to their environments, and improving those which best do so.

Man is subject to the same laws of evolution and adaptation. Food, climate, sociology, etc., affect stature, weight, temperament, color, and feature. Hence there are endless human variations.

As the different zones produce different or peculiar plants and fauna, it is reasonable to believe that they have produced or evolved different human beings. It would be no more unreasonable to hold that all the many varieties of the different bovine families on earth sprang from one sole parentage, than is the sacred notion that all the diverse human races descended from one lone Adam. The jaguar of South America is called the American lion, but it bears little resemblance to its African namesake; the Papuan islander is called a man, and he shows as little resemblance to the Caucasian.

A few million years ago, when perhaps the earth was so tipped on its axis as to submerge the northern zones and elevate the southern, there was a vast unbroken southern continent inhabited by a cultivated race from which the present Papuan is but a degenerate relic preserved on a mountain peak left above the waters. In the course of a few million years more, perhaps, the position of the poles, in fulfillment of a law of precession not now fully known, may be again reversed, and some venturesome navigator, Columbus-like, sail from a proud old country in the south into the unknown seas of the north to discover a remnant of poor Thibetans on the top of the Himalayas; or a few degenerate, starving Caucasians on a peak of the Alps; or perchance some curious human specimens, containing a mixture of red, white, and black ancestry, on Mount Elias. The mental effort to grasp and apprehend the few million years required to accomplish such reasonable results should be a trifling matter to the believer who is familiar with orthodox teaching, that when the sinner has suffered millions upon billions of years in hell-fire the everlasting business has only just begun.

Leaving these far-off and apparently slow changes that are ever going on, and coming down to our own time and place, we see change and variation all around. Difference is universal. No two persons are exactly alike—do not reason or think alike for any length of time. Each brain shows some peculiarity. Hence appear all grades of mind from weak to strong. Probably no person could be found, however, who does not feel inferior to a few and superior to many others. It may flatter an imbecil to be told that in the sight of some god he is the equal of a Gould or a Parkhurst; but it is not true. He has not the business sagacity of the one, nor the pious meanness of the other.

Having in mind these facts of diversity, how absurd appears the priest demanding universal acceptance of and belief in his arbitrary creed of impossibilities—demanding belief in supernatural dogmas wholly beyond proof and reason—undertaking to force every individual mind through the same narrow theological slot. Had a creator intended such a demand, merciful common sense would have impelled him to make every brain exactly alike.

The priest boasts of the long-continued extensive following of his Jesus-god, and claims for them a substantial agreement. But universal history, undisputed outside of convents, describes these religious fanatics as having had no bond of agreement during the first three hundred years of the era. A chaos of supernaturalism prevailed—quarreling all that time about the quantity and quality of a god in their Jesus, etc. But about 325 A.D. the emperor Constantine, having made use of them in gaining the throne, for his own security organized a portion and supported them in inaugurating a system of superstition and fear that culminated in centuries of Dark Ages. Back of these Christians was the sword, already stained with domestic blood, of the first Christian emperor; in front of them the cries of mercy were remorselessly stifled.

The sword forced Christianity on the peoples of Europe, many of whom had enjoyed a degree of happy freedom. Then began a tendency toward equality, broken only by caste. The common people, impoverished, venerating the priest, spending their time in mumbling prayers to goblins, became mere dummies. The priest succeeded in reducing them to a condition of equality well-nigh that of a like number of geese. Long-continued habits and enforced opinions had dwarfed and deformed their minds. The monotony of thought was such that the brain became torpid and ceased to act further.

But in process of time this monstrous hierarchy was rent and torn by its own vast extent. A priest here and there chafed in his theological strait-jacket, and began to think and speak heresy. Some of the princes of Europe yearned to be free from papal dictation. And hence the elector of Saxony is promptly in alliance with Luther. The sword established the papal power. Twelve hundred years of almost passive equality of ghostly thought pass by, and then the sword undertakes to demolish it. It succeeded only in part. For the next two hundred years, cruel religious wars and persecutions desolated heretical Christian homes for the love of God. A large chunk was detached from the papal trunk; and the chunk claimed the original trunk. In support of this claim, Protestants can point to its pious zeal in not suffering a witch to live, etc. At any rate the Reformation brought about another chaos of supernatural notions. The detached trunk soon broke into fragments, each one having some intangible, senseless hobby, to try to elucidate which an endless stream of books and sermons have failed.

The chaotic condition of the gropers in supernaturalism still continues. Episcopalians and Presbyterians are now deeply exercised on two momentous questions, to wit: Do their creeds mean what they say? and, Did their God, in writing his story-books, confine himself strictly to truth? The Newtons, Briggses, Smiths, etc., are slowly vomiting portions of the divine panacea, but they hate to acknowledge that the entire drug is bad. Through these godly contentions we gain a goodly degree of freedom. But should the Christian factions again be united, the godly hierarchy would strive to again reduce the minds of the people to one narrow line of thought—to mental slavery.

But having equal rights does not insure equal conditions. They have little relation one to the other. Any citizen has the right to obtain a mansion on our Fifth avenue. The chances are a hundred to one that his conditions are not equal to the task. Fortunately, nature produces variety of conditions. Heredity says, men are not born equal.

What a dull world this would be if perfect equality prevailed—if we were all exactly alike. There could be no ambition, no admiration, no contention, no progress, no saints, no heroes, no love. No one loves an exact counterpart. We could have no races, no games, no fun at the expense of others, no back talk, and no excuse for Comstocks.

Well, this stagnant condition was approaching under complete church domination. Nothing invented, nothing discovered, nothing learned, during a period of a thousand years. The life and heat of the solar sun were opposed by the death and freezing fear of a ghostly son. The invigorating light of the one gave place to the paralyzing hell-flame of the other. We want no more Christian unity, leading to imbecil equality of mind through fear and non-use of reason. Why, the Christian's heaven, with its supposed invariableness, must prove intolerable to a Freethinker, should one be so unfortunate as to ever get there. We like variety, with a little spice of contention; and mother nature kindly grants it.

Some years ago an English Methodist minister, who came to this country in search of prey, related a little of his experience. He was assigned to the spiritual vineyard of Sullivan county and its neighborhood. In climbing a spur of the Catskills looking for game, he encountered an elderly Scotch woman who had been well trained in Presbyterian certainties. On making known his pious business, and rubbing his hands in hopeful expectation, the good woman, feeling strong in the truth as she knew it, frankly informed him that if there was anything in the world she hated more than the devil it was a Methodist minister.

The continuance of just such loving hate gives joy and safety to the Freethinker. L. G. REED.

Our London Letter.

Mr. St. George Mivart, the Roman Catholic scientist, who was at one time a strong opponent of the theory of evolution propounded by Chas. Darwin, but who, on studying the question more fully, honorably acknowledged that he had been led to believe in the doctrine, has just published a magazine article on "Happiness in Hell," which is scarcely in accordance with the orthodox papal idea of the delights of that mythical place, as he conveys the impression that there is reason to believe the climate and company is improving on what it was during the Dark Ages. This is a great concession to advanced opinion on the part of one who still owes allegiance to the pope, and although there are many Catholics who are only nominally such, and hold very heterodox theories, their utterance of these would not carry such weight nor deal such a blow to the church as so prominent a man as Mr. Mivart. Though the church of Rome claims to be unchangeable in its views, everyone knows that this is far from the case, and were it not for the Jesuit faction there would be nothing to fear from its proselytism. This pernicious branch of the church would only be too pleased to have the opportunity of compulsory conversion by means of the rack and other ingenious medieval instruments of torture, winding up with an occasional Auto-da-fé, though it is not at all likely that the mass of the people will ever lend themselves to support such atrocities again.

Persecution to a greater or less extent will always be, as it always has been, a favorite weapon in the hands of the clergy of all denominations of the misnamed Christian church, and in the country districts of this happy Protestant England it is carried on by the state parsons as far as lies in their power. They carry out this peculiar line of argument as far as they are able, but their power is continually decreasing, owing to a few honest journals who systematically expose their doings and act as an effective check upon their actions. That such things are done is not surprising when such men as the marquis of Ailesbury, who is not considered respectable enough and has been consequently warned off Newmarket racecourse, have the power to appoint clergymen to various livings. At one time this eminent and worthy member of the aristocracy had forty presentations, but they are now reduced in consequence of his having sold part of his estates; and it is quite competent for any blackguard rich enough to purchase livings to have the power of appointment. The only wonder is that people should be such fools as to submit to have a parson so appointed to minister to their spiritual wants, but they seem to fancy they must be pestered with these guides to paradise, and a bad one is better than none at all.

That high-class Christian and erstwhile African filibuster Henry Stanley has given his opinion on missionaries and their work, which was highly appreciated by his audience who were connected with the Wesleyan body. He informed his hearers that he had met missionaries in all parts of the world, and although there might have been a few who did not quite come up to the standard, he had seen none who did not deserve his esteem. As Stanley has such an opinion of the most meddlesome, quarrelsome body of individuals on the face of the earth, we can fairly well judge what manner of man he is himself. He went on to say that "the love that undertook the conversion of savage races must be pure, forgiving, and disinterested, abounding with self-sacrifice and with abiding hopefulness." I cannot quite understand whether he really meant all he said or was only poking fun at them. "There were those who looked at the number of years they had been established and were dissatisfied with the result. They would find such statements in official reports, but the writers of these reports had forgotten the simple fact that missionaries were human and that the savages were the most depraved specimens of the race." What a noble sentiment and how worthy of a true believer in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of Christ. Compare it with Thomas Paine's: "The world is my country, mankind are my brethren, and to do good is my religion." There is no occasion to ask which is the nobler sentiment of the two.

Anthony Collins is writing a series of very interesting articles in the "Agnostic Annual" entitled "Stray Recollections of a Freethinker," which embraces the history of the movement and the country during a very momentous portion of the present century. The relation will, I trust, be elaborated and published in book form, and, if possible, at a popular price, to enable the needy Freethinkers, of which there are many, to possess a copy.

It is to be regretted that prominent men in the Established church are giving public vent to heterodox views, and it will make it all the harder for Freethought to find an enemy to strike, and give a longer lease to the apostles of Christianity. In a few years, what is now known as open and terrible blasphemy will be held as most orthodox, and Freethinkers will have to find fresh fields to fight in and new subjects to fight over. J. D.

Reply to Otto Wettstein.

DEAR SIR: In your able and courteous letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 31st, in reply to my communication of November 4th, you put some direct questions to me; and I take pleasure in availing myself of the courtesy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to reply to them, and at the same time to pass in review the principal points of your argument and correct some misapprehensions on your part as to my position.

I do not find the idea of God so necessary in order to account for the outer material universe as for the inner or spiritual one, for the world of matter as for the world of mind. A soulless, will-less nature may be safely left to its own devices, which must speedily resolve themselves into one—to lapse into a state of inertia. For myself, who am conscious of possessing both soul and will (and if I could not demonstrate the first to Mr. Wettstein's satisfaction, I could speedily convince him, at least, that I am well endowed with the second), something more is necessary to solve the otherwise inexplicable riddle of my own existence. For I find in myself a ceaseless hunger and thirst after righteousness—an instinctive craving for absolute perfection which only the Infinite can satisfy—the capacity to conceive of an ideal which has never been realized, nor ever can be save in the Deity.

Without God and eternal life, human nature and human existence are a hopeless enigma and our life a dreary muddle. Admit the divine factor and the problem is solved readily, rationally, and satisfactorily; hence I do but take the course which common sense and reason dictate, viz., cease to squander my time on meaningless and aimless hypotheses, but bend my energies to the study and comprehension of the principles that are seen to underlie the true solution.

That "something exists" is demonstrably true. That "something cannot spring from nothing" is also self-evident. That "existence-to-day proves eternal existence" is a logical deduction that evidently means more to me than it does to you. To my mind, as well might we assume a time when the universe—the effect—was not, as to assume a time when God—the Cause—was not.

The only existence per se in the universe, you say, is matter. This statement may mean much, little, or nothing, according to your definition of matter. If you define it as science usually does as being whatever possesses the inseparable attributes of extension, ponderability, impenetrability, divisibility, and inertia, and manifests itself to our consciousness only through the five bodily senses, I take issue with you at once, as I am made conscious every moment of my life of the existence of much that is not matter at all, according to this definition, though it matters a good deal to me. My thoughts and feelings are a very real and important part of me, though I can neither see, hear, smell, taste, nor handle them. On the other hand, only make your definition of matter elastic enough, and the term may be made to cover all degrees and forms of existence from the Supreme Being to the mote that dances in the sunbeam, in which case it no longer has any distinct meaning whatever.

After all, what is matter, however defined, in itself? Do any of us know? Can science inform us? Material phenomena surround us on every side; but when we attempt to analyze them into their primal elements, at every step the process takes us further and further into the realm of the unknown and the unknowable. Under the searching scrutiny of science solids resolve themselves into liquids, these into invisible, almost intangible gases, these again into undemonstrable, almost inconceivable molecules or atoms, until at the final analysis matter fairly eludes our grasp and vanishes ghost-like from the realm of sensation, guarding jealously to the last the secret of its being. "Canst thou by searching find out God?" demands Holy Writ. "Canst thou by analysis find out substance?" echoes science. When we shall have solved the mystery of the latter, it may prove to be a revelation, also, of the former. "I am"—essential Being—is the mystic name of God.

But matter is also force, you say, which involves the converse proposition that force is matter. This seems to me not merely putting the cart before the horse, but confounding the cart with the horse, and insisting that both are identical. I have not so learned natural philosophy. To me the distinction is not more marked between the Me and the Not-me than between the Force that acts and the Matter that is acted upon and furnishes the base of resistance.

You designate nature as soulless and will-less, and in the same sentence speak of it as selecting genial elements and evolving into trees, flowers, etc. Does not selection necessarily imply choice and purpose, and these again desire or will? Can we possibly have the one without the other? Thus by one stroke of the pen you have logically and unavoidably endowed nature with a will, but Whose will? my friend, is an important question. Is Nature, so-called, a sentient, intelligent, self-existent, eternal entity? Then is Nature but another name for God.

Let me explain here what I mean by creation. Not a single arbitrary act at some remote period of the long-forgotten past. Creation, as I understand it, is a perpetual process, a ceaseless giving forth of Divine Energy which when we meet with it on the material plane we designate as Force, which is but another name for the same thing.

Do not imagine for a moment that I believe in a divine idler, loafing in somnolent torpor through an eternity of blank ages, "in absolute dark vacuum" (as if the Sun of Righteousness, the true Light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world, could ever be in the dark!), until the idea suddenly occurred to him to relieve the dull monotony by going to work and creating a universe out of nothing! and having furnished it with a set of ready-made laws, warranted to work automatically, going to sleep again, leaving the machine to run itself, or only interfering occasionally when it threatened to run off the track. I have no use for any such God as this. To me, God is essential Life, and life, as we know, is action. Inactivity is death. To my mind creation has neither beginning nor ending. And yet as creation is a perpetual work existence is ever new, because ever renewed from the Eternal Fount of Being: hence we are always "in the beginning" of some new phase of life, and in every beginning the creative hand is visible. There never was a time—there never will be a time when the Creator is not creating; should the creative work cease, he would cease to be the creator. Are you answered?

The instinctive yearning of the human heart for human companionship of either "persuasion" is but a faint reflection of the infinite desire of Infinite Love for objects upon which to expend itself. The "divine necessity of loving" is ineradicably impressed upon all sentient life because the Infinite Source of all existence is Love eternal. I cannot imagine a period when essential Life was not living and operating, when essential Love was not engaged in loving and benefiting.

You counsel me to discard a God of perfect Wisdom, and then invite me to join you in the pursuit of greater wisdom than the world has yet attained. For you are conscious of the dismal hiatus between what is and what should be that must impress all thoughtful, conscientious minds. This demand of yours, my friend, for higher attainments in the outer world to respond to the more perfect ideal within is, to my mind, a more convincing proof of God's existence than is the whole material universe. The moral sense is more a stupendous miracle under the no-God theory than are the revolutions of the spheres. For it constitutes, so to speak, a sixth sense through which God, who is essential Good, must be apprehended, if at all.

"No more Catholics, Methodists, Mohammedans, or Jews, but only men and brothers." Good. But why stop here? Why not add: No more high or low, rich or poor, bond or free, learned or ignorant, believers or unbelievers, saints or sinners—only men and brothers, which includes, of course, women and sisters, for it will never do to overlook "t'other persuasion." I believe in my heart this is what we are coming to by the grace of God and the power of free thought, which are incompatible to my mind, and I don't mean to be left out in the cold if I can help it.

"No more devotion of time and money to the unknown, but only to the true, the pure, and the beautiful." Good again. But can we diligently and faithfully pursue the true, the pure, and the beautiful without being irresistibly carried back to their Divine Source—to Him who is the Truth, the Way, and the Life? I confess I cannot.

It is easy enough for me to "let the gods go," but God—eternal Verity—will not let me go. "Whither shall I flee from thy presence?" If I look up into the heavens I see His Name written there in characters of light by that dazzling orb which is His glorious type and symbol and whose quenchless fires are fed by His deathless energy. If I look abroad, beyond the limits of our solar system, I see the boundless paths of space gemmed with countless dazzling hieroglyphics, every one of them a perfect system of worlds, and spelling out through infinitely varied combinations the same eternal Name. And if I take refuge from the immensity without in the microcosm—the little universe within—still He is there. The Divine footsteps echo through the inner halls of being and memory, and in the inmost chamber of the soul I am suddenly brought face to face with the Divine Presence through some overpowering conviction, and then, though I have doubted with Thomas and denied with Peter, I am constrained to cry out in wonder and reverence, "My Lord and my God!"

The persistent tendency of matter toward the vanishing-point under scientific investigation has led a large and growing school of thinkers to deny its existence altogether, to claim that mind or spirit is the only real entity and that all so-called material phenomena are purely subjective. There would seem to be some grounds for this assertion in the fact that matter so persistently declines to be interviewed. If the world was not created "out of nothing," as theologians claim, it would certainly seem to have evolved out of what is "next to nothing." For an atom is no more tangible or demonstrable an entity, physically speaking, than a ghost. Both are pure deductions or assumptions, and an assumption does not appear, from a materialistic standpoint at least, like very solid material out of which to construct a universe unaided.

To claim, therefore, that matter is the only existence per se, is to make an assertion fully as incapable of material or even logical demonstration as is the existence of God—to my mind far more so. I no more know that nature exists than I know that God exists; for I have the same sort of evidence for the existence of both, viz., the testimony of reason and personal consciousness.

I have not space in the limits of this article, without monopolizing this whole issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the purpose, to meet your arguments as fully as they deserve, but must be content to review some of them very briefly, if I touch them at all. For instance: "Two infinite entities are impossible." True, but God only is infinite; nature is finite; and the infinite and the finite must be correlative and coexistent.

Again: "A God implies being"—granted—"an organic being"—granted again—"this, physical being"—if by physical you mean material in the ordinary sense of the word, I dispute it. "An unlimited being is an absurdity"—not necessarily—"but a limited being cannot be God"—of course not.

"A God can only be conceived of in the form of a man." Here you touch upon a profound necessity and law of human nature and in so doing strike the key-note of the Gospel. By man, created in His image, God can be apprehended only in and through the human image made divine; hence the universal demand by all forms of religion for the incarnation of the deity.

My idea of personality is not bounded by outward shape or limited by space and time. I have known a vigorous, far-reaching personality to be lodged in a weak and diminutive physical frame; while on the other hand, a large, powerful body may contain a puny and feeble personality. The essential elements of personality, as I have shown, are not so many inches or ounces of organized matter, but the spiritual qualities of love, wisdom, and power, or will, intelligence, and activity. God is the essential Soul of the universe: the inexhaustible Source of Being; but He is likewise an infinitely perfect, omnipresent Personality. So while He dwells "in the temple of his holiness"—the divine human nature assumed at his incarnation, through which alone he may be apprehended by the mind and heart of man—he is at the same time present, as all-pervading Life, in every part of his boundless universe, somewhat as the sun is ever present with us by his energizing, fructifying beams, and his image is the glory of our sky, though mil-ions of miles of space separate his glowing orb from ours.

I do not fear to trust the Deus-Homo of my faith amid the blazing suns He has created and of whose deathless fires He is the energizing soul. God is a Spirit, not a clay image or idol to be knocked to pieces by a fast-flying world. Your thought can traverse the interstellar spaces to the remotest star without being "frozen out" in the transit. Your love of science can explore the sun himself without being "incinerated." Are thought and affection absolutely nothing? Then why spend time and money for "the moral and intellectual elevation of mankind," as you suggest, since this consists merely in the cultivation of nonentities?

Those elements of being which, divided in the creature, constitute the distinction of sex, are united in the Creator, of whom, consequently, gender can not be predicated, since He is the all-in-all of humanity, which in the creature is not completed in either man or woman taken separately, but only in the two united in one perfect soul. "For the man is not without the woman nor the woman without the man in the Lord."

But while science teaches us that the sun ever shines in undimmed splendor, we know that earth-born clouds and mists often arise to hide his glorious image from our sight. But for the seeming anomaly of sin and suffering in the handiwork of a perfect Creator reflectiv minds could never have doubted the love and wisdom, still less the existence, of the deity. I have not time now to enter upon this phase of the subject, which is capable of rational explanation, but you will admit, my dear sir, that it cannot but be comforting and sustaining amid the trials and tribulations, the sorrows and sufferings of which we all have our share in this transitory life to feel assured that through all and in spite of all, eternal, changeless, un failing Love dwells ever at the heart of the universe, and that unerring Wisdom guides and overrules all things for eternal and beneficent ends.

Liberal Societies.

The meeting-room of the Manhattan Liberal Club in Masonic Temple was well filled with an attentive audience Friday evening, January 20th, to listen to a most interesting lecture by Henry Rowley, the question being, "Has Man a Soul?"

Owing to a death in the family, Miss E. Schachtel, the recording secretary, was unable to be present, and the reading of the minutes of the last meeting was dispensed with. After several communications had been read, the lecturer of the evening was introduced. Mr. Rowley had chosen a subject which was calculated to excite considerable controversy from the fact that a large number of Spiritualists were present. The lecturer dwelt on the derivation of the word "soul" and its usage at different periods. In primeval times, he said, when a man could not explain a phenomenon of nature he ascribed it to the soul of nature, which he called god; in bygone ages the soul was to the people the unknown quantity, the x, of life. The pagan-Christian church accepted the doctrine of a material soul only because the Christian fathers believed that they must have a material soul to burn in a material hell. The church had not always taught that every man had an immortal soul. St. Augustine was the upholder of a doctrine that is at the present day gaining considerable foothold among church people, i. e., that immortality is the gift of God. Mr. Rowley then took up the subject of consciousness and thought and argued from an empirical point of view. He quoted and dwelt at some length on the doctrine of Locke: "Nihil est in intellectu quod non prius fuerit in sensu." Curiously enough not one of the lecturer's critics thought of retorting with the epigram of Leibnitz, "Nisi intellectus ipse." so well explained by Kant. Mr. Rowley closed his lecture with an eloquent appeal to those of his audience who had found salvation in a truer and better light, to teach the less fortunate that there is no soul and that it is their duty to do whatever they can to better themselves on this earth and not, at the cost of their present happiness, prepare themselves for some place which they know nothing about because it does not exist.

The first critic was Mr. Wilson McDonald, second vice-president of the club. He is one of the oldest members of the club and is an enthusiastic Agnostic Spiritualist. Mr. McDonald said he believed there were souls because he had often received communications from the souls of his friends who had departed this life. Mr. Wilson was the next critic. He said that he believed there was a hereafter, because he had noticed that all those who live pleasant lives always die a pleasant death, and those who live miserable lives die miserable deaths. The other critics were Mr. Holland, Mrs. Dunlevy, and Mr. Moses Oppenheimer.

Mr. Rowley's reply to his critics was a very caustic one. His quick wit silenced several of the audience who were inclined to interrupt him with remarks that were not quite pertinent. He took each of the critics separately, and, with the exception of Mr. Oppenheimer, treated them "without gloves," so to speak.

On January 27th, Dr. William H. Von Swartwout will lecture on "The Potency and Promise of Modern Science."

The regular meeting of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association was held last Sunday in the Fraternity rooms, Bedford avenue and South Second street. Mr. Henry Rowley, secretary of the association, was the lecturer. By the time he stepped forward to speak there was not a vacant seat in the hall. Joseph Warwick, president of the association, presided. The lecture was on "Prophecy and Miracle." "Like many other words used by theologians, the word prophet," said Mr. Rowley, "has been twisted into something it never meant in ancient times. It originally meant a singer, musician, seer, or one wise in divine things. Abraham was called a prophet; so was Aaron, the brother of Moses. A good idea of the original usage of the word is given in 1 Sam. x, 5, 6." The lecturer then read the various prophecies that are supposed to refer to the coming of Christ, and showed how the writers of the New Testament had endeavored to make him the long-promised messiah.

Mr. Rowley then took up the second part of his lecture, "Miracle." He gave the different definitions of the word according to various theologians, and answered each in a manner that elicited much applause.

There were a number of critics, of whom Messrs Sullivan, Hansen, and Bellows took the same ground as the lecturer. It was in answering his adverse critics that the lecturer's keen wit came into play.

Next Sunday the entire afternoon will be devoted to celebrating the birthday of Thomas Paine.

The Newark Liberal League held a very successful meeting last Sunday afternoon at No. 177 Halsey street. Mr. Bird, president of the League, was the principal speaker of the day. His subject was "The Godly or the Godless." His critics were Mrs. Smith, Dr. Wright, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Gillen. The members of the League are actively engaged in raising a fund for a larger and more commodious hall. Next Sunday afternoon the birthday of Thomas Paine will be celebrated with appropriate ceremonies.

To the Freethinkers in the State of Minnesota.

In view of the approaching election of a United States Senator in the above state, I addressed an official letter to each candidate, asking for their particular views upon our principles and objects.

Among the questions asked were, their position upon

1. "The taxation of church property upon an equality with all other property."
2. "The keeping of our public schools absolutely free from any and all religious influences."
3. "The abrogation of all so-called 'Sunday laws' and especially the repeal of the recent law closing the World's Fair on that day."

Among the answers that I have received from the candidates is the following:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Dec. 31, 1892.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Secretary Freethought Federation of America, Chicago, Ill., My Dear Sir: Yours from Spokane, Wash., under date of 26th inst., is at hand, and I hasten to reply.

If I am a candidate for the United States Senate it is of a party so largely in the minority that there is not the remotest prospect of an election; but nevertheless I am pleased to avail myself of the opportunity your letter offers to testify to the faith that is in me regarding the matters touched upon by your questions.

First, I am not in favor of "putting God in the Constitution," am irrevocably opposed to uniting church and state.

Second, I can see no good reason why church property should not be taxed: in fact I am in favor of taxing all property, in which event the per cent of taxation would be so small that taxes would not be burdensome to the poorest church society.

Third, I am in favor of absolutely non-sectarian schools.

Fourth, The World's Fair, public libraries, art galleries, parks, fields, and woods should be open to the public on Sundays, and the world's toilers should be encouraged—even helped—to visit them on that day.

Very respectfully yours, S. M. OWEN.

In view of the above statement so definite and clear one cannot help being struck with admiration at the candor of the writer.

Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

How slowly, as a consequence of its dependence, the conception of causation evolves, a glance at the evidence shows. We hear with surprise of the savage who, falling down a precipice, ascribes the failure of his foothold to a malicious demon; and we smile at the kindred notion of the ancient Greek, that his death was prevented by a goddess who unfastened for him the thong of the helmet by which his enemy was dragging him. But daily, without surprise, we hear men who describe themselves as saved from shipwreck by "divine interposition," who speak of having "providentially" missed a train which met with a fatal disaster, and who call it a "mercy" to have escaped injury from a falling chimney-pot—men who, in such cases, recognize physical causation no more than do the uncivilized. The Vedda who thinks that failure to hit an animal with his arrow resulted from inadequate invocation of an ancestral spirit, and the Christian priest who says prayers over a sick man in the expectation that the course of his disease will be so stayed, differ only in respect of the agent from whom they expect supernatural aid and the phenomena to be altered by him: the necessary relations among causes and effects are tacitly ignored by the last as much as by the first. Deficient belief in causation is, indeed, exemplified even in those whose discipline has been specially fitted to generate this belief—even in men of science. For a generation after geologists had become uniformitarians in geology, they remained catastrophists in biology; while recognizing none but natural agencies in the genesis of the earth's crust, they ascribed to supernatural agency the genesis of the organisms on its surface. Nay more—among those who are convinced that living things in general have been evolved by the continued interaction of forces everywhere operating, there are some who make an exception of man, or who, if they admit that his body has been evolved in the same manner as the bodies of other creatures, allege that his mind has been not evolved but specially created. If, then, universal and necessary causation is only now approaching full recognition, even by those whose investigations are daily reillustrating it, we may expect to find it very little recognized among men at large, whose culture has not been calculated to impress them with it, and we may expect to find it least recognized by them in respect of those classes of phenomena amid which, in consequence of their complexity, causation is most difficult to trace—the psychical, the social, the moral.—Herbert Spencer.

Let the Good Work Go On.

DEL NORTE, COL., Jan. 7, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, for which send the following books. Let the good work go on. I am,
Yours for Truth and Liberty,

Back Numbers Furnished.

GARNET, KAN., Jan. 9, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: As I hav, with very few exceptions, the unbroken files of THE TRUTH SEEKER for ten or twelve years back, I will send to anyone wanting single copies if they will remit return postage and two-cent stamp for my trouble; or if more than one copy is wanted, at the rate of three for two two-cent stamps and postage. I will supply almost any number wanted within the time before mentioned to the person applying personally or addressing Box 190, Garnet, Kan.
Very respectfully, CHARLES GREGG.

The Preacher Looked for Ingersoll First.

ATLANTA, GA., Jan. 10, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for which send me the herein-named books. Atlanta is a much priest-ridden city. In fact, I have only been able to find two outspoken Freethinkers since I came to this place, two months ago. The Rev. Sam Small preaches here, and has as large a turnout as do the operas. I went to hear him a few nights ago, but he disgusted me so that I have not gone back again. He attacked Colonel Ingersoll's doctrine, but looked all over the house first to see that the colonel was not listening. I would have given a half a cent, and a dollar to boot, if Ingersoll had been in the audience to pull him down a little. Wishing the Editor and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a Happy New Year,
Yours for freedom,
S. B. PRICE.

Considerateness in Argument.

GRATTAN, MICH., Jan. 10, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I have just read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th inst. your editorial, "The Design Argument," and am constrained to congratulate you on the spirit, tone, and temper, as well as ability, it manifests. Also I send my esteem to Mr. Anderson for his "Please think carefully on my mental difficulty and help me out of it, my brother, if you see the way out yourself." Let us all try to help each other to reason together in that spirit and you may do much in that way for the cause of Liberal Freethought. During the past year I think there has been a marked improvement in THE TRUTH SEEKER in that respect. Arguments should be strong and forcible, but may be more effectual if clothed in language that draws opponents to us rather than repels, by friendly words of truth and soberness. "A little word in kindness spoken," etc., is the better way.
CONVERSE CLOSE.

Here Is a Pleasant Mountain Breeze.

BODIE, CAL., Jan. 10, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: We live, move, and have a being in the Golden state, nine thousand feet above the sea level in a mining town on the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada mountains. And as you will see by the following list of Freethinkers, we read and digest in our brain both ancient and modern writers, and have decided that Nature is our only true Good. Disobey Nature's laws and we here on this earth suffer the penalty. Other life we know naught of. However that may be when we quit this life, we are prepared for what there is to be. Nature is our dictator and guardian. Honor is a true principle, virtue its guidance. We all have a Bible and all read it the same as other history. Our mountains are full of Freethinkers. Some are cautious and will not express their views on religion or politics for fear of offending and losing the friendship of some one in position or their patronage in trade.

Would that we could have a good Liberal talker with us to lecture two or three evenings and spread the facts before us like a map. But then we are so isolated from the regular thoroughfare that it would be a hardship for a good lecturer to call on us. We are happy in our belief and pity the hypocrite. N. J. SALISBURY.

This Missionary Has Lit On Peculiarly Obdurate Heathen.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Jan. 9, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I will send you a few names of gentlemen whom I know to be rather Liberal-minded, to whom you may send sample copies. I have been trying to get some new subscribers, but have failed so far. I believe I live in one of the worst creed-bound neighborhoods on earth. We have all the different religions imaginable, from the Presbyterian up to the Latter Day Saints. About ninety-nine per cent of the people look as if they were in the last stage of dyspepsia, so you see they are rather a tough set to tackle with THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially with Heston's finishing touch. I have a round-up now and then, but I am going to keep "at 'em."

I have been taking your paper for several years, and could not get along without it. I like its present management as well as the past. I fully indorse Mr. Charlesworth's suggestion with regard to the future success of the Freethought Federation. I would like to hear from others on the same. Where are Uncle John Peck, Will S. Andres, and B. R. Anderson? I hope they have not dropped out for good. You may send me some of the "Text-Book" pages.

Yours for Liberty,
J. L. BOWLING.

A Bible Bungle.

NEOLA, IA., Jan. 11, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I have just received the second copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER through the agency of Mr. E. O. Howard and am patiently waiting for the next. I gave one to a friend who is a firm adherent to the consecrated wafer doctrine.

Now, I have a problem from the Bible (devil's encyclopedia of crimes) that I wish to submit to any pulpit-pounder, amen man, or sanctified yelper. In 2 Chron. xxi, 20, we find the following: "Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years and departed without being desired. Howbeit they buried him in the city of David but not in the sepulchers of the kings." In the succeeding chapter we find these words: "And the inhabitants of Jerusalem made Ahaziah his youngest son king in his stead, for the band of men that came with the Arabians to the camp had slain all the eldest. So Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah reigned. Forty and two years old was he when he began to reign." By an inspection of history we find the son was crowned the same year in which his father died. Thirty-two years, age of father at coronation, plus eight, length of reign, would make him forty at death. But the same year this king's son was forty-two! Intelligent young man—two years older than his dad, and the youngest, too! Now, if the youngest son in this remarkable family was two years older than his papa, how much older than the old man were the other kids who were slain? Many times when solicited by my pupils to demonstrate a problem I think of referring them to Jas. i, 5. However, some of them might turn the tables on me and as a refutation refer me to the first part of the last sentence of Jer. xv, 18.

With success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Respectfully, W. J. THOMPSON.

Will Never Expect Sense in Sermons Again.

NEWTON, IA., Jan. 12, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: As I never see any account in your paper of what is going on in this part of the Lord's vineyard, I thought I would let you know we have fourteen shops from which the gospel is retailed. There is a good deal of competition for the trade of the town, which contains three thousand people. We do not have to wait six months before we are members in good standing. After declaring our intention of becoming such, they ask us to join in with them regardless of our belief. All that we need to do is to go to church, pay the preacher, and have all the fun out of the church sociables we can get. They sometimes preach a sermon in which the most radical would find very little to object to. Such sermons are sops thrown out to catch Freethinkers. I am sorry to say that they have drawn quite a number of professed Liberals in. I listened to one of these sermons and was so well satisfied I could not help congratulating the preacher. I have been several times since, expecting to hear some more of the same kind, but every time have been disappointed, so I have come to the conclusion that life is too short and time too precious to be thrown away in listening to them.

We had Franklin Steiner, from Des Moines, Sunday, the 8th, who gave two lectures to small but very appreciative audiences. He is quite a young man, of good address, an interesting speaker, well able to present the objections that Secularists take to the Christian religion. He should be encouraged by all Freethinkers.

With regard to the management of the paper I am well satisfied, and hoping that you will soon be released from your financial strait, I remain, Yours truly, A. WADSWORTH.

Impassioned Appeal for Liberty and Truth.

VERA CRUZ, IND., Jan. 11, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Longer neglect may be a crime, for why should we permit our thoughts to lie dormant when all around us we see not only the weeds of superstition error and folly thrive and blossom but the deadly fruits felling our fellow-beings on the right and left?

Winter time is revival time. During a short time here under my immediate observations two victims from an overdose of religion were handcuffed and dragged to the insane asylum at Richmond, Ind., as raving maniacs. Such results are almost unbearable to an intelligent Freethinker. I feel it to be a duty to address our legislature not only for investigation but for a remedy, especially since the whole flock, sheep, goats, and asses, seem disposed to conceal the real cause of the shocking condition of the victims.

"I have known deeper wrongs. I that speak to you" see daily our dear youths, bright-eyed boys and girls with tender, giant little intellects and hearts pure and simple, utterly robbed of reason, and the fangs of credulity gradually fastened upon them. And when reason begins to dawn within them they are informed that they are all too utterly depraved by nature to understand the things pertaining to their best interest. By the time they are catechised they are prepared to seek out a mental thralldom, willing to crush down any thought of doubt regarding the absurd creeds they had instilled during the prime period of development.

Hence the selfish tendency of governments, the disregard of the sacredness of life, the cruelty in society and in the homes.

A religion that claims for its author blood and tyranny and eternal punishment could not be expected to bring anything but such deplorable results.

Lovers of justice, truth, and liberty, who have at heart the elevation and happiness of the human race, let us earnestly but winningly expose the errors which surround us. Let us consider that this monstrosity is supported by money, the ruler of the world, in the churches from high carnival to the penny-box to relieve the rich of their surplus and to rob the poor of their hard earnings.

When, oh, when will the people permit the wool of blindness to be drawn from their enslaved vision?

Let us live pure lives to the best of our knowledge, and truth in our hands shall triumph. The next time I write I shall say something. Yours for Freethought,
J. J. M. MILLER.

Polygamy, and Other Vileness of the Bible.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Jan. 18, 1893.
AN EX-CHRISTIAN TO THE READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: In the December 4th issue of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat is an account of Mormonism, by Mrs. Pratt, a sufferer and a victim. When listening to the teachings of Joseph Smith she thought she heard the voice of a prophet divine, a man chosen of the Lord, with ways of godliness, actions of kindness and love. He took the Bible for his rule of faith and practice. People thought and still think that from the inspired word could come no lies. From the doctrine of love could spring no fires of hate. In this they are wrong. To speak the truth against the lies inspired places God's temple in danger of destruction from God's people. To differ on points of superstition has in the past been a perilous undertaking. Monopolists of vice and corruption, priests were zealous in the enforcement of the tenet "unquestioned obedience." To think was a crime; to reason, blasphemy.

The Christian may disavow the doctrine of plurality of wives. In this is he not an infidel? Can the teachings of an unchanging God be altered? Can God correct his own work? Can he correct himself? If a thing was right in Genesis, why should it be wrong in Revelation? Christians of to-day condemn human slavery, yet the God who said "Love thy neighbor as thyself" commanded the enslavement of an unfortunate people. For what reason? A boy laughed at the frolics of a drunken man and his posterity should bow beneath chains. Had Noah used his reason instead of wine would he have been drunk?

We are told that water can be no purer than its fountain; yet the water of life, spiritual life, issues from this receptacle of corruption. There is no doubt that the church is better now than a few hundred years ago. We admit this. For this improvement there must be a cause. Is the cause of improvement in the church? No. The creeds are as dangerous as ever. It is man that has improved. The few brave souls who lifted their voices in behalf of man, of the rights of man, are the source of this improvement. Such men as Voltaire, Hugo, Paine, and our own brave Ingersoll whom the church would gladly exile to climates warm, have brought about this change. As men advance along the pathway of truth they will find it solid underfoot and well lit by the torch of reason. Superstition's dark and marshy way for want of travelers must be closed, and in time will pass from out the memory of man.

JOSEPH REILLY.

Obituary.

DECATUR, ILL., Dec. 23, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Maurice D. Leahy is dead. This announcement can bring joy to no breast—it must bring sorrow to the hearts of all true Liberals who have heard his name and fame. There was no baseness in his nature; every thought was pure and ennobling. He was the most unselfish man I ever met. And, while ambitious, his ambition was of the kind which seeks to promote the welfare of all mankind without thought of personal advantage. Conscious of his own power, comprehending the weakness of others, he valiantly led them onward to intellectual warfare, glorying not in the struggle except for the fruits it promised—"Universal Mental Liberty!"

Truth, right, honesty, and virtue were words of meaning to him; falsehood, wrong, dishonesty, and immorality receiving no countenance at his hands. He lived above his fellows, yet kindly sought to lift them to his plane. His conception of life and its duties was of the highest possible order, and it required no special effort on his part to live up to his ideal.

While naturally aggressive, he also possessed a sound judgment and acted with calmness and deliberation, showing sufficient conservatism to insure practicability. Politically, he was a worshiper of Jefferson, and an admirer of Cleveland, whose famous tariff message he styled "Our Second Declaration of Independence." The able poem bearing this name appeared in the Cairo Bulletin of Nov. 22, 1891, and may have helped to secure the nomination of Cleveland for the campaign of 1892, as it was widely quoted and fired the Cleveland heart. Professor Leahy was an earnest, eloquent speaker, a brilliant writer, and combined the elements of poet, philanthropist, philosopher, and statesman. Had he lived a few years longer doubtless his voice would have been heard in Congress. His highly sympathetic nature made him the friend of the oppressed, and with voice and pen he pleaded their cause, appealing to the better judgment of men. To him it did not seem fitting that such a high civilization as ours should breed and foster abject poverty and want.

After leaving Liberal, which he had helped to found, he became president of the Business College of Hutchinson, Kan.; later accepted a chair in the faculty of the college at Great Bend, Kan., and still later the principalship of the high school at Cairo, Ill., and with the close of this year there his life-work ceased. In all of these places he had served with credit and honor and greatly endeared himself to those with whom he came in contact.

Last Fourth of July Prof. M. D. Leahy was my guest and for the last time. Bronchial catarrh soon claimed him for its victim, and, after months of suffering, he sleeps in the public cemetery at Osage Mission, Kan., where loving hands laid him with appropriate ceremonies. He died Sept. 27, 1892, aged twenty-seven years, seven months, and nineteen days. He died a Freethinker. In his death we lose an ideal man, but his example will not be lost, and his words, whether by tongue or pen, will live forever.

W. S. ALLISON.

Communication from Christ.

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Dec. 17, 1892.

DEAR MR. EDITOR, TRUTH SEEKER FRIENDS, AND ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN: We desire to apprise you of the honor recently conferred upon us. Individual honors are generally of but little importance to the public; but we consider this to be of importance to the whole world. Previously we were quite obscure and unknown; but as great honors and great mysteries always descend to the lowly, it is not strange that we should be so exalted above our fellows. This honor comes in the form of a miracle, as usual, although it is well authenticated that since Christ's time there have been no miracles. Nevertheless, we have received a letter from Jesus Christ purporting to have been written and posted at New York city. At least, we have received one so signed, as described in my husband's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th.

Now, friends, look to yourselves. Previously we have always had a great desire to visit the metropolis of our country, but please excuse us at present. You could not now hire us to come within a hundred leagues of your much-honored city. We feel for you, friends; but we are very thankful we cannot reach you. We suppose this to be the second advent of the messiah. In what guise he has made his appearance, this time, we know not.

Look about you, friends, and discover whether or not you have recently had any miraculous conceptions among you. It is our opinion you have, and this savior is like Kallikrates, who died and after two thousand years was born again.

It is so long since the first advent of Jesus Christ, that what his promises were for the second is in our mind a little vague. However, it will not tax our memories much to recall what the first brought. He says, "Suppose ye I am come to give peace on earth? I tell ye nay; but rather division" (Luke xii, 51). "For I am come to set a man at variance with his father, and a daughter against her mother, and a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law" (Matt. x, 34). "And the brother shall deliver the brother up to death, and the father the child, and the children shall rise up against their parents and cause them to be put to death" (Matt. x, 21). "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth. I come not to send peace on earth, but a sword" (Matt. x, 34). "He that hath no sword let him sell his garment and buy one" (Luke xxii, 36). Jesus also spoke of those who did not believe his teachings as fools, hypocrites, vipers, etc. Now, friends, we repeat, look to yourselves; for we fear you may be in danger of hell-fire and damnation. Think of the pent-up wrath of God, that has been gathering, like a tempest, might and strength throughout the ages, about to burst over your defenseless heads. He must in that time have laid up many a grudge against you. Furthermore, he informs us that the fluid in his veins is not water but blood. Now, formerly we said the fluid in his followers' veins was vitriol, but we never undertook to define what his was, though we never for a moment supposed it was anything so harmless as water. Had we been compelled to answer, probably we might have said it was something of a very combustible nature.

In conclusion we will add, should any of our friends receive similar communications, however vague, we implore them not to treat the matter lightly, for the safety and welfare of our bodies, if not our immortal souls, may depend on our keeping out of sight. We remain, your much honored and thoroughly frightened friend,

HERRISSA MARIE CRYDER.

A Product of Religion.

ELSINORE, CAL., Jan. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: During the past week I had occasion to visit the city of San Diego, and Tuesday morning I was awakened by the unearthly moanings and miseries of an unfortunate young lady who had become suddenly insane at the hotel during the night. Upon investigation I found she had been attending some meetings in connection with a Presbyterian Young People's Christian Endeavor convention.

The statement made by the press that she had attended a Spiritual meeting was intended to shield the guilty parties who worked the "overflow" business, and who, while they are perhaps no worse than Spiritualists, nevertheless occur in larger numbers at San Diego, and hence throw the blame on the weaker party by virtue of their heavenly father's political influence in the "City of Bay-and-Climate."

The meetings held each evening were called "overflow meetings," and this sad case was a portion of the overflow aforesaid. It seems that this young girl had been led astray and seduced by a prominent follower of the example set by "our savior" when he used to make those sudden and unexpected historical pilgrimages across country from Jerusalem to Jericho in company with the Marys and Marthas and the devil of holy remembrance. When this sanctified cuss found out how matters were he at once hastened to make one of those forced marches, and is now doubtless preaching the gospel and following the example of his distinguished predecessor in some remote part of Washington. When he had disappeared the unfortunate girl could only find comfort and solace in the company of the heavenly protector of whom she had heard so much favorable report, through the medium of these "overflow" meetings where she was continually reassured that "all things are possible with God," and that "his ways are not as our ways," which latter she has only found out to her shame at the sacrifice of her reason, her property, and her virtue. During all that day until night it became my duty as a human being to protect her life against her own hands, while the necessary red tape was being measured off so that she might receive the needed care and accommodations at the county hospital, and during all of which time not one solitary ministering angel or professor of the sustaining religion of Jesus Christ and him crucified put in an appearance. Of all the heart-rending, pity-inspiring scenes I have ever witnessed this was the most wretchedly piteous. Having given her confidence to a man on account of his supposed companionship with God, she had been led astray, betrayed, deserted, and had fallen. In the excitement and exorbitant statements and promises of a series of "overflow meetings" is it any wonder she went crazy when these promises were not realized? Often in her frenzy she would mistake me for her heavenly father, which of course I strenuously denied, and, falling upon her knees, implore my forgiveness, which I could not deny, asking me to take her to heaven at once away from the world of friends who had deserted her in her hour of need. Sometimes, in occasions of more rational moments, she would imagine that I was the devil, when she would crouch down like a frightened animal and emit the most hellish, ear-splitting shrieks ever described by those pious partners of God, Milton and Dante, in their lurid pen-portraits of portions of the accommodation below prepared for those who refuse to believe it.

But to make a long story short, I succeeded in convincing her that God had sent me for her—being thus compelled at last to use one of his infernal deceptions—and succeeded in removing her to quarters where Infidels could administer the kindness of humanity.

If you think I refrained from unbosoming any of my thoughts on the "beauty and power of religion" that evening, for fear of hurting the tender feelings of any dear religious soul who now rushed in to offer assistance, and information to newspaper reporters, you are mistaken and do not know me as well as some of my pious neighbors do. F. H. HEALD.

Eloquent Portraiture of the Church.

BRADFORD, PA., Jan. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It does me an immense lot of good to learn that the New York presbytery at last, after a very lengthy investigation in which no stone has been left unturned to convict Professor Briggs of heresy, has, to its eternal honor, sided in with the professor who in his inaugural address claimed that there are errors in holy writ; that Moses did not write the first five books in the Bible, known as the Pentateuch; that Isaiah wrote but few, if any, of the manuscripts in the book bearing his name. These are glorious admissions. These are what the Infidels have been contending for for many long years. For these same admissions thousands of the bravest of the human race have been burnt at the stake, torn asunder upon the rack, stoned to death in dungeons, lingeringly suffered and died in exile, met death under the collar of torture, had their feet crushed in iron boots—in short, suffered all the tortures of the fabled damned!

Just think of it, a presbytery in the nineteenth century, and in New York city, at that price has made the admission that Moses was an impostor, and also his inspired friend Isaiah. The Infidels have forced them to do these things. A presbytery in Detroit, Mich., not long ago did away forever with infant damnation. If we listen now very attentively we can hear John Calvin in his grave groaning that pious Presbyterian groan, and thumping the walls of his grave in Christian fury and calling out in his religious insanity, "You infernal heretics, isn't that what I taught you?" Ah, John, your followers have slightly fallen away from your harsh ideas, and they are to-day trying to make amends for your ignorance, and the suffering and misery you caused by your infernal influence, in the legacy you left that part of the human race who unfortunately happened to follow you.

There is yet an immense lot to be done in the line of retribution. We ask now that every other religion along with the Presbyterian quit telling lies about Infidels, and give them a little credit where it belongs. Professor Briggs has, it is reported, quoted from the works of Thomas Paine, which made up part of his memorable inaugural address. These things will go down in history, and Thomas Paine will reap the harvest of his great labors. It will take some time to educate the church, but these things must eventually come. Ignorance cannot always predominate. The champions and their creeds will be educated, for in the nature of things this must needs come to pass. We have read with tears in our eyes of the persecutions and murderings of all those infernal dogmas. We have seen enough of the brute nature of man displayed, and we ask you Christian creeds and champions one and all to make acknowledgment, give back in an excuse (it is all ye can give) Bruno's ashes, with those of Voltaire. Give us back the burnt ashes of the bones of Wycliff, that lay reposing for forty years in the grave and were then exhumed and burnt, to appease the wrath of your infernal God. You hyenas, return the ashes of John Huss, who was guaranteed all the protection necessary to go from his home on a long journey to the council of Constance, where you perfidious monsters put him to death.

Side with the Presbyterians just for once, as far as making a truthful admission is concerned, and in good time the Infidels will undoubtedly forgive you for the wrongs perpetrated against the human race. I do not purpose to speak here concerning the five million human beings that the Catholics have in the years past put to death with that most infernal of all contrivances, the Catholic Inquisition. Go into France, Spain, Italy, Portugal, England, and Scotland, and see the piles of human bones that are to-day bleaching and whitening beneath the sun and rain, the results of the fierce hatred and bigotry of the champions of Christianity. No sane man can have any respect for dogmas and creeds that caused so much human woe as he reads of in the profane histories of the world. Remove the secular laws and governments, and the Catholic church would do all in its power to return the human race back to chaos and eldest night. In a couple of centuries bigoted and ignorant priests, popes, and the like would again be taking it upon themselves to burn, slay, and crucify the populace for the glory of their God, the most infernal of all the monsters ever conceived by the imagination of man.

Since I have read the histories of the largest number of the Christian sects and have seen what the race has suffered in the long night, I have concluded I would do what little I can against the further influence of ecclesiasticism, with its begging and loafing army of useless ministers. We have, I presume, about one hundred thousand idlers in the shape of priests, ministers, parsons, etc., in this country alone, who live on the wages of the underpaid toiling, suffering, ignorant millions, going about in fine raiment, and from their pulpits on Sundays telling their congregations to "take no thought for the morrow," to "consider the lilies of the field," pay their mite into the contribution-box and support their pastor, and if they don't receive their rewards here they will hereafter. Here in our own town the Catholics are building a $30,000 edifice, and every male and female member of that absurd sect has been told by their sky-pilot they must contribute $500 by all means and manners toward its completion. See the vast sums of money that are expended the world over so foolishly. Suppose this wonderful wealth was applied to the education of the people! It would be only a little while, comparatively speaking, until people would get the fear out of their hearts of an eternal punishment. It is a question of educated intellect. When the human race gets the means and opportunities to this end, then the bloated vampires that have been fed, I may say, on the heart's blood of the community will have to get down, and perhaps will have to go to digging ditches to get enough to sustain life. This latter will after all be a higher position, considering the one they left. It is a question in my mind if they know enough of other vocations to take them and bring out the desired results. In all the history I have ever read I have not as yet seen where one of those idlers has invented anything of use. Not one single invention is credited to the entire host of them, save those instruments of torture whereby millions have suffered all the agonies of the mythological damned.

The theological star is setting. Across the barren fields of the cruel past I see its lingering ray fast fading out of the sight of people of common sense. But we still hear the sorrowful moans of the widows and the painful cry of the orphans of its cruel, unrelenting, and tyrannical sway. The men and women of common sense will soon be called upon to erect its monument, and write it a suitable epitaph. Whosoever amongst us then living this task will fall to, we have no doubt it will have justice done it. If the burning tears shed from fear of it could be accumulated, or if it were possible to gather all the blood that has been shed in its name, together in one vast reservoir, we should have a body of fluid sufficient to float the pope of Rome from the Vatican to New York city in a boat as large as the Great Eastern.

I have been told lately that I have given up my heretical ideas. This looks it doesn't it? I shall give them up with my last breath if shown I am wrong. This is not likely. A Happy New Year!

To Educate the Children.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Allow me to call the attention of the readers of that very important part of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Children's Corner, to a handsomely bound and printed book of one hundred and ten pages called "Truth in Fiction," written by the editor of the Open Court, Dr. Paul Carus, and published, price $1, at the office of the paper last mentioned, 169 to 175 La Salle street, Chicago. I welcome this book, because all that is needed to give our views the victory is to make them widely known; and one way to do this is to take advantage of the relish of all children, even grown-up ones, for romance.

The volume contains twelve tales, and begins by telling how an Indian girl offered up her life to abolish the custom of sacrificing maidens to the Great Spirit by making them float in the "canoe of death" over Niagara falls. Then we have a fable about a convention of the animals, who try in vain to agree on who is the greatest and noblest. This title, however, is fairly claimed, says Dr. Carus, by the man; for he has established his dominion over other animals by making his mind "an image of the laws of nature." To the same effect is the story called "The Clock or the Watches." There was once a church which had on its steeple a clock which people supposed to have been made by a mysterious person who was named Time, and had to be always spoken of and written about with capitals. The clock went so badly that some people ventured to make watches for themselves, according to rules laid down in a very old book supposed to have been written by old Time himself. The strife between the believers in the clock and the believers in watches was very bloody three hundred years ago, and has not yet been quite made up. So many mistakes are now known to exist in clock, watches, and almanac—church, consciences, and Bible—that we need a still higher authority than any of the three. This best of guides is science.

He never leads us astray, but it is by no means easy to find out what path he wishes us to take. I am glad to find the readers of this column unlearning theology so readily; but I hope they will excuse one suggestion. Unlearning theology does not necessarily mean learning science. Error ought to be rejected anyway; but how much we gain by rejecting theology depends entirely on what we put in its place. Truth does not come cheap to anybody, but demands much study, careful observation of the facts around us, and just appreciation of what has been observed and thought out by others. Scientific habits of thought are not to be formed by merely wishing for them, but need a great deal of mental discipline. This is best given by making observations and experiments for one's self systematically; but valuable help toward beginning and keeping up such a course of discipline may be gained by reading scientific books and magazines. I venture to add a list of some which may be found interesting and useful by boys and girls in the high school. Many other books might be mentioned:

Agassiz, "Journey to Brazil."
Broderik, "Zoological Recreations."
Buckley, Miss Arabella, "Fairy Land of Science," "Life and Her Children," "Through Magic Glasses."

Correspondence.

GROVE, TEX., Jan. 11, 1893.

MISS WIXON: This is the first time I have written to the Corner. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years. I like to read the Children's Corner. I am ten years old. The people in the village where I live are religious cranks; they say I will go into torment forever and burn. I will close for this time.

A friend of the Freethinkers,
LALIE BRADLEY.

KENT, O., Jan. 12, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My stepfather takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am thirteen years old. We live on a farm near Brady lake, where there is a large summer resort. On Sundays they have Spiritualist meetings. I have never been to one, but I go to the picnics. I go to school, and study reading, grammar, spelling, physiology and hygiene, geography, and arithmetic. I go to Sunday-school, but not for religion. There are not many Freethinkers around here. If this escapes the wastebasket, and I see it in print, I will write again. Please correct mistakes.

Yours, a Liberal, RAY NICHOLS.

BOX BUTTE, NEB., Jan. 4, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am eleven years old. I go to school and study reading, spelling, arithmetic, geography, physiology, writing, and drawing. I have two sisters and two brothers. My mamma takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. Papa reads it, but would not take it if it were not for mamma. We like to read the Children's Corner. We have the "Story Hour." There are no Freethinkers here but us. I spoke a short sermon Christmas eve that you published in the Children's Corner. Your friend, CAMMI SAULTS.

P.S.—I am glad you returned safe from your trip across the ocean. C. S.

[We hope Cammi will write again.—ED. C. C.]

PENNSBOROUGH, W. VA., Jan. 1, 1893.

DEAR MADAM: This is my second letter to the Corner. It is a pleasure to me to read the letters, especially. We have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for only two years. The Methodist revival has just closed. Six were converted. There are people here who steal, cheat, gamble, and lie, go to the "mourner's bench" in the winter, and the next year they will do the same thing. The United Brethren revival will begin soon. The Brethren always have a big time.

For fear of making my letter too long, I will close. I would like some of the readers of the Corner to correspond with me. I am corresponding with two boys. Your Liberal friend,

FRANK CROMWELL.

P.S.—My address is Pennsborough, Ritchie county, W. Va.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utility of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

BLASPHEMY.

Argument by R. G. Ingersoll in the Trial of C. B. Reynolds, at Morristown, N. J. This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled in a trial for "blasphemy." Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 33 pages. This is, beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly calendered, and richly tinted, the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published works, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fike, Eliza Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," Love, Liberty, Art and Morality, Science, Nature, The Imagination, Declaration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny, "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual Liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

Prices.—In cloth, beveled boards, gilt edges, $2.50; in half morocco, gilt edges, $5; in half calf, mottled edges, library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible finish, $9.

Any of the above sent to any address, by express, prepaid, or mail, post free, on receipt of price. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject. In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIOAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continuity even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. Gems of Thought.

We should live with our fellow-citizens as with equals, without obsequiousness or meanness.—Cicero.

We should be men first, and subjects afterward. It is not desirable to cultivate a respect for the law, so much as for the right.—Thoreau.

THIS frightful doctrine [of witchcraft] filled every friend with suspicion of his friend; it made the husband denounce the wife, children their parents, parents their children. It destroyed the amenities of humanity; it did away with justice in the courts; it broke the bond of friendship; it filled with poison the golden cup of life; it turned earth into a very perdition peopled with abominable, malicious and hideous fiends. Such was the result of the belief in the supernatural; such was the result of giving up the evidence of our own senses and relying upon dreams, visions and fears. Such was the result of the attack upon the human reason; such the result of depending on the imagination, on the supernatural; such the result of living in this world for another; of depending on priests instead of upon ourselves.—Ingersoll.

ALL the priests of the Scarlet Woman hold Bible-reading to be an abomination.

I was always told that the Bible was "the word of God." It seems, however, that a larger sect of Christians than that to which I belonged regarded and regarded it, in the words of Leo XII., as "the gospel of the Devil." Now that I have come to the years of discretion, I admit that, from internal evidence, I should attribute the authorship to the latter rather than to the former claimant. The wickedness of the volume is suggestive of the Infernal Penman. But God and the Devil were so very friendly in ancient times (testify their amicable interviews in the Book of Job) that the work is, perhaps, their joint effort, which they brought out on the understanding that they should share equal profits from probable sales. If my surmise be correct, their Divine and Satanic majesties must have had a row over the division of the profits—most probably the former tried to chisel the latter—for they have produced no such volume since, for which the world may be inexpressibly thankful.—Saladin in God and His Book.

We have seen that the animal world may be considered a unit, a more or less closely connected ascending series of diverging organisms. Then we have also seen that the plant world is linked together in a manner that suggests progressive development from its simplest to its most varied forms. But it is found that animals and plants are joined by intermediate forms that puzzle naturalists to tell which kingdom they belong to. Haeckel calls these forms Protista. They combine certain peculiarities of the lowest forms of the true realms of life, and thus establish the unity of all life that exists upon the earth. They represent a stage of existence, early in the world's history, before life divided into the two branches of animal and plant. Thus we find that the quarter of a million of species of animals and plants can be fairly assumed to have arisen from a common origin. If they were created at once in all these distinct forms, we are at a loss to see any meaning in their construction, but if we conceive that the present condition of living things is the result of continued modification of the parent forms, then the whole chain of life becomes intelligible to us.—Robt. C. Adams.

If a truth dishonors a family, ought the historiographer or historian to inform the public of it? No; doubtless he is not bound to reveal the shame of individuals; history is no satire. But if the scandalous truth belongs to public events, if it enters into the interests of the state; if it has produced evils of which it imports to know the cause, it is then that the maxim of Cicero, that we ought not to dare to conceal any truths, should be observed; for this law is like all others, which must be executed, tempered, or neglected, according to circumstances. Let us beware of this humane respect, when treating of acknowledged public faults, prevarications, and injustices, into which the misfortunes of the times have betrayed respectable bodies. They cannot be too much exposed; they are beacons which warn these always-existing bodies against splitting again on similar rocks. If an English parliament has condemned a man of fortune to the torture; if an assembly of theologians has demanded the blood of an unfortunate who differed in opinion from themselves, it should be the duty of an honest historian to inspire all ages with horror for these juridical assassinations. We should always make the Athenians blush for the death of Socrates.—Voltaire.

THE MYSTERIES OF GODLINESS.—Jere. xiii, 2—7.

News of the Week.

Ex-PRESIDENT HAYES died on the 17th, of neuralgia of the heart.

In a discussion going on in English papers over the existence of the sea-serpent, Huxley is taking the negative.

A BILL making it obligatory for a civil marriage to precede the religious ceremony has been introduced in the Italian parliament.

INVESTIGATORS have found that greenbacks which have been much handled bear many bacteria. Congress will be asked to provide for the frequent replacement of old paper money by new.

MR. CARTER, the leader of the new sect of Carterites at Coloma, Mich., has promulgated an order received by him from the Lord that all members make over to their leader a tenth of their property.

In the creation of a permanent Apostolic Delegate in the United States, some Protestants say they see—with insufficient evidence, perhaps—some crafty work of the pope, and eventual supremacy of the Catholic church in this nation.

THE central figure in a new play at the Haymarket Theater, London, is Hypatia, the beautiful maiden who taught mathematics and philosophy at Alexandria, and for her successful rivalry of Christian proselyters was torn to pieces by a mob of monks.

In Russia the famine is growing. In the provinces of Archangel and Petrozavodsk one-third of the people have turned beggars and robbers. The condition is what that of France was before the Revolution, and has been produced by the same cause—suppression of knowledge and freedom by church and state.

In all the Catholic churches in the country there were read last Sunday letters from the respective archbishops announcing the period for contributing Peter's Pence. Archbishop Corrigan of New York, after likening Mr. Pecci to "the sun, which fails not," exhorts that the collection this year surpass even those of preceding years.

CATHOLICS complain that Commissioner Morgan of the Indian Schools is determined to use the remaining two months of his term in continuing his persecution of their sect. Despite protests he retains in office "a maleficent agent" named Rust who "interferes with the aborigines and deters them from sending their children to the Catholic schools." To a complaint against such doings, Senator Vest has written in reply: "Commissioner Morgan is a narrow-minded bigot whose chief idea seems to be that all government powers should be used to prevent Indians being made Catholics."

D. STANTON COIT, who founded a Social Reform Club in London, has come to America to organize another to purify what he calls Darkest New York. He is, he says, disproving the assertion of General Booth of the Salvation Army that no other organization than that will raise the fallen. He is being assisted by Prof. Felix Adler, of the Society of Ethical Culture. He will furnish, instead of gospel, soap and water, food, clothes, shelter, and education. He will first attack the Tenth ward, which he says is twice as densely populated as any part of London. The society will sell coal, groceries, etc., etc., at wholesale rates; establish swimming baths; create parks; provide tenements with roof gardens; institute social and temperance societies with coffee and reading and billiard rooms, and gymnasiums and dancing parlors, with lectures and classes, and dramatic, musical, and art societies; and keep the streets clean and the houses in a sanitary condition.

At Hawleyville, Conn., a new sect has risen, calling its belief the Fourfold Gospel. Fourteen years ago a rich farmer named Hawley was reduced to his bed by nervous prostration. During his confinement he had taken to reading the Bible assiduously, and suddenly conceived the idea that he would be cured by faith if he threw away physic while reading James v, 14, 15: "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." He took his son, Frank K. Hawley, into his confidence, explaining that he had heretofore been a church-member and a member only, but that he had now found salvation in the word of God. He wrote to a band of faith curers in Boston that they should pray for him, at that distance, and soon after the hour appointed for the prayer Mr. Hawley, it is reported, arose and walked. He grew completely well, and lived till a year ago, when he died of cancer. From this event the sect has risen.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Astronomy and Design.
We will conclude our presentation of the evidence that the facts of astronomy do not indicate an intelligent designer.

We have referred to the many spheres that have been created without any view to the inhabitation of man; we will now speak of the empty space which has been produced with equal lack of a purpose to harbor him. To the ordinary view the space between our earth and other bodies does not seem so vast as to suggest waste and unnecessariness. It seems to most to be about the right distance to obviate a clash of these bodies, and at the same time allow the passage of heat and light. The truth is, however, that the interspaces of the heavens are infinitely too vast to fall in with the Theistic conception of a universe whose end is the inhabitation of living races. If we were to state the distances between this earth and almost any of the stars in the form of miles merely, the mind would be unable to make so much as a beginning toward conceiving the enormous numbers that we should have to present. To reduce these huge sums, astronomical writers have introduced the device of "light-time." Light travels at the rate of 186,000 miles a second; a second of light-time is therefore taken to mean 186,000 miles. Now, the distance of the earth from the nearest fixed star is three and three-quarters light-years. The distance of the brilliant dog-star is seventeen light-years, or a million times that of the earth from the sun. Many other stars are removed to the extent of two or three thousand light-years. Thus the ray by which to-day we are enabled to know the existence of these bodies, left its source when Homer and Moses trod the earth, and the sages of Greece and doctors of Egypt lived and taught. "Yes," says Du Prel, "there can be no doubt that there are new-born stars which give us no light simply because their rays have not yet reached our earth;" and there as presumably are others which have become cold and dark whose light, shot forth scores of millions of years ago, is to-day still beating upon our sphere. Now, all these inconceivable spaces might as well have been studded with inhabited worlds, but they were not; and as we find these spaces existing without any view to mankind, we may infer the globes of matter, including the earth, to be existing without any view to mankind.

Besides all the worlds, and all the space, created without any reference to man, there were vast lengths of time that passed equally without reference to him. The period during which the human race has been on the earth is trifling in length compared with the eons that passed before it appeared. A fair estimate of man's existence is now held to be a few million years at the most; but the earth must have occupied in condensing and cooling into its present state millions of millions of years. We find, indeed, on glancing over the facts of geology and astronomy, so tremendous as to be quite inconceivable these eons of time while

"Eldest Night
And Chaos, ancestors of Nature, hold
Eternal anarchy amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand:
For hot, cold, moist, and dry, four champions fierce,
Strive here for mastery, and to battle bring Their embryon atoms. . . . Chaos umpire sits,
And by decision more embroils the fray
By which he reigns: next him high arbiter Chance governs all."

Contemplation of the vastly long continuance of this mad hurly-burly—this

"Wild abyss,
The womb of nature and . . . her grave.
Of neither sea, nor shore, nor air, nor fire,
But all these in their pregnant causes mixed Confusedly"—

contemplation, we say, of the periods wasted in this turmoil will bring the mind into seeing the age of man's existence as what it really is, a brief and fleeting second amid ages of manless duration. Man's short day is but a ripple on the ocean of the infinite continuance of the universe. Even when the earth had become so cooled as to bear life, thousands of other life-forms than man succeeded one another during ages compared with which man's term is but as a tiny speck. For a long period the air was so thick with carbonic acid gas as to be unbreathable by any species resembling the human. Plants, whose appetites are for substances just the opposite of those required by mankind, thrive, and reached titanic size. The coal which burns in our grate is their remains. To deposit a coal layer of a few rods in thickness required inconceivable periods. Then, we find other ages as long during which the earth is inhabited solely by gigantic reptiles—ages during which "Nature breeds,

Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things,
Abominable, inutterable, and worse
Than fables yet have feigned, or fear conceived, Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimæras dire"— ages while uncouth creatures,

"huge of bulk,
Wallowing unwieldy, enormous in their gait,
Tempest the ocean; there Leviathan,
Hugest of living creatures, on the deep
Stretched like a promontory sleeps, or swims
And seems a moving land, and at his gills
Draws in, and at his trunk spouts out a sea.
Meanwhile the tepid caves, and fens, and shores,
Their brood as numerous hatch."

Among these monsters one was a frog that weighed a ton. Of what good to human beings is a frog that weighs a ton? There were, too, large companies of the Stegosaurus Ungulatus. These were lizards thirty feet long. It is repugnant to belief that a God would prefer the society of lizards thirty feet long to that of a party of well-conditioned New Yorkers. The Atlantosaurus was a creature sixty feet long, beside whom our elephants would seem pygmies. He often erected himself and ambled about on his hind legs, after the fashion of a man, letting his tail drag. He would have been able, standing in Lafayette place, to look in at the fifth floor of the TRUTH SEEKER building. It is not consonant to reason that the Lord would consort with such creatures in preference to a company of neatly dressed and often seemly-behaved humans. And then the Pelorosaurus, seventy feet long, resembling one animal in one part and some other animal in another—we shall refuse to entertain the idea that any such ridiculous beings could be successful rivals of ourselves in the affections of a Creator. It must be admitted that this Age of Reptiles, and all the other long pre-human eras, were brought about merely by natural causes that did not care a pin whether man existed or not, and in fact didn't know a thing about him.

There is another consideration that operates against the notion that man's existence is the ultimatum, the culmination and flower, of the train of processes in which the earth has so long striven. This is, that that existence, so long delayed, must presently be closed. At a period, remote in our conceptions but nevertheless certain to arrive, this earth, and with it all the life that it now carries, must perish. The balance of the heavenly bodies which keeps them from colliding is not, as the Theist formerly proclaimed in enthusiastic admiration, unchangeable and enduring. It must sooner or later be destroyed.

There are two stars in the constellation of Hercules toward which our sun, with its whole retinue of the earth and the other planets, is moving at the rate of eight hundred thousand miles a day. Not merely do the members of each solar system influence one another by their gravitation, remarks Spencer, but each solar system influences and is influenced by the others. If our movement into other parts of space continues, it is likely that the new conditions under which our planets will be thrown will greatly alter their present relations; and a slight change of the temperature of the earth would abolish its life.

Then, too, did the above contingency not occur, it is nevertheless believed that our solar system must come to an end within itself—by causes originating in itself merely. Astronomers have lately obtained reason to believe that the interspaces of the universe are filled with a very thin fluid, which they have termed ether. While the air about no planet extends farther out than a few miles, this ether, it is conceived, fills every nook and corner of the universe out of which it is not crowded by more solid matter. The existence of this fluid, which was once but hypothetical, first received proof—or what is some degree of proof—from the retardation of Encke's comet. This comet has at present a period of twelve hundred and ten days, and it returns each time two hours and forty-five minutes sooner than calculation requires. Since 1789 its period has shortened two days and sixteen hours. Similar diminution of orbit has since been discovered in the comets of Brorsen, Faye, and D'Arrest. The only thing, astronomers say, that could cause these comets to take each time a smaller circle, is a substance pervading all space. The consequences of this discovery are stupendous beyond conception. For if this fluid exists, and by its friction impedes comets and forces them into smaller circles, it will impede our planets likewise and force them into smaller circles; and as these circles go on contracting some one of the planets will get so near the sun as to be drawn into it; and the immediate diffusion of this body, melted to a mist like that from which it was in the first place formed, will check the rest of the bodies and permit them to be hurled upon the sun also, and the solar system will again be chaos.

"Husks
And formless ruin of oblivion."

The time when this catastrophe will come to pass is indeed remote. While the light body of Encke's comet will at its present rate lose half its velocity in twenty-three thousand years, a ponderous planet, it is true, can be retarded but minutely. The planet Jupiter, for instance, would take seventy million years to lose one-thousandth of his speed. But the length of the period has nothing whatever to do with the certainty of the result. If space is filled with a fluid however thin, a fatal end is as demonstrable, may be made as plain to all of us earth-dwellers, as the fall of an aërolite to our sphere. Says Whewell: "Since there is such a retarding force perpetually acting, however slight it be, it must in the end destroy all the celestial motions. . . . The moment such a fluid is ascertained to exist, the eternity of the movements of the planets becomes as impossible as a perpetual motion on the earth." Helmholtz says: "A time will come when the comet will strike the sun; and a similar end threatens all the planets, although after a time to conceive the length of which baffles our imagination." Mayer likewise contemplates the precipitation upon the sun of all the bodies that now revolve about it. It is true that the period which will elapse before this disaster will be millions of millions of years; but such periods are now passing; such periods have already passed; and they will be passed again.

Not merely this, but the doom which awaits our solar system must be that, at one time or another, of all the other systems throughout the universe. If the other stars have planets revolving about them, as does the star which we call our sun, the same end must ensue in the case of every one of them.

And not only must each system be destroyed in its own borders, but, says Spencer, the systems altogether must sooner or later lose their balance with one another, and fly together themselves.

All these uniting masses, hypothesis farther proceeds to mark out, must by the shock of their collision be fused into such primary world-mist as that from which they first sprang; and this must cool and condense again; and the process be repeated how long conjecture falters in saying. Nature, in the words of Du Prel, "amuses herself with an eternal building-up and destroying, the beginning of which is like the end, and the end like the beginning."

But the race of man will be no more. Such is the transiency, the ill contrivance, the failure to meet the requirements of the human race, of the system of heavenly bodies whose temporary balance, chancing at the present moment to vouchsafe us mortals a brief and fleeting day—one paltry moment amid eternities—was formerly pointed to in pride as an unchanging and wondrous work emblazoning to the gaze of all the wisdom and goodness of a God.

Even supposing that the heavenly bodies preserve their present courses, life on the earth must nevertheless terminate, from another cause, infallibly certain. This is the exhaustion of the heat of the sun. This heat is being diffused in immense quantities. As a passing mark of the absence of design everywhere found, the part of that heat which this earth receives is but the 2,300-millionth, the rest being squandered, in a small degree on a few uninhabitable planets, but mostly in empty space. The sun's supply of heat, be it ever so great, must necessarily become exhausted. Then the earth must become

"A continent
Dark, waste, and wild, under the frown of night
. . . . Exposed, and ever-threat'ning storms
Of Chaos blust'ring round, inclement sky."

These dire doings we cite only to drive from human conception the harmful notion of a God. We do not dwell upon this winding-up of the affairs of the universe, and retirement from business of that now eminent and widely credited concern, in any spirit of dolor. We do not indeed see much that requires to be said upon it at all, except that it discredits the notion of a man-serving Designer. It is well to say this, because that notion of a God has caused woe to the race, and should be thrust out. But it would be of no good to say anything else, because anything else will not help mankind. If the end is to be thus, our fretting over it will not tend in the slightest degree to prevent it. So we may as well be jolly. Crying over spilt milk and over a spilt universe is equally to be discommended. If some generation or other has to die and terminate the race, why, it will beyond doubt be able to do its own dying; we don't intend to die for it. Rather the conception of the end admonishes us to make pleasant use of the time remaining. Our achievements since we have begun to emerge from the groping dark of superstition show pretty clearly that we can do this—i. e., be happy—much. The time to be happy is now; the place is here; the way to be so is to "crush, conclude, and quell" Theists.

The sum of this whole matter of adaptation in the system of the heavenly bodies may be expressed in few words. We laid down, a week or two ago, the proposition that moving and moldable bodies fit themselves to their courses, and fit their courses to themselves. Now, the stars and planets, etc., are moving and moldable bodies, and have simply fitted themselves to their courses by getting themselves into such shapes and sizes that they could pass without colliding; and the way that they did this was, such masses as did at first collide welded themselves into one so that they cannot collide any more. And they have fitted their courses to themselves by what is the same process stated in other words—drawing into themselves all the smaller interfering bodies or impeding mists so that these bodies and mists do not obstruct the passage any more.

This even brings us to a way of looking at the matter still more unacceptable to the Theist—we cannot say that these bodies do not collide, for they did do so. We can say only that they—or the largest of them, at any rate—are not colliding just at the present moment; and after all the only reason that they do not is that they did in the past.

Although the heavenly bodies do move, it is quite as true, on the other hand, that there are equally great masses of matter that do not move—that is, the parts of which each heavenly body is composed do not move amidst themselves. These were separate and moving once, but they falsified the Theist's assertion that such bodies do not collide by actually colliding, and now they (for a while) can do so no more. We view each heavenly body as a whole, but we may just as well contemplate it as composed of twenty parts or smaller bodies, and complain that these do not stay separate and revolve about among one another without colliding. But the fact is that they cannot do this; they tried it once and did collide—this earth is covered with aërolites and aërolite-dust that did collide, and these move as separate bodies no more. Thus some of the universe gets a chance to move, and moves, and the Theist calls it evidence of a God; and some other of the universe does not get a chance to move, and does not move, and he calls it evidence of a God. At this rate, anything is evidence of a God.

Some things move; others don't—therefore God. Such is the Theist's logic when reduced to plain words. This seems to us like saying: Some things are round; others square—therefore God. Or: Some things are red; others blue—therefore God.

Or to change the point, we will say that this proposition of the Theist can as easily be used to prove anything at all else as a God. Thus:

Some things move; others don't—therefore God.

Some things move; others don't—therefore the tariff should be maintained.

Some things move; others don't—therefore the tariff should be abolished.

Some things move; others don't—therefore tight lacing is harmful.

Some things move; others don't—therefore the cow jumped over the moon.

Next week we will deal with other arguments for the existence of a God advanced by Mr. Anderson.

Mr. S. P. Putnam came over to this town from Philadelphia after the Paine celebration there and made a few calls around before going back to labor with—and belabor—the Congressmen on the Sunday opening question. He reports the hearing had before the House committee, as the eager result of a most wide awakening of the people. Over fifty speakers were present. The fanatics had apportioned their time in a most systematic manner, and Elliot Shepard sat watch in hand to pull down the long-winded of his crowd at the expiration of the allotted time. Jo Cook had ten minutes, the little ministers from one to five minutes. The repealers were less well organized, but each individual did the best he could in the time given him. The mayor of Chicago was the principal speaker. Drs. Thomas, of Chicago, and Savage, of Boston, were the next in order. The organized working-people were represented by Mr. Morgan, the Seventh Day Adventists by Mr. Jones. Mr. Putnam was alone representing Freethought, and he won his place against the declared wish of Durbin to have nothing to do with Freethought by having some friends who showed the chairman of the committee that Mr. Putnam had a solid backing which would not be ignored. Mr. Putnam and Mr. Jones were the only ones who argued from the right standpoint, that Congress had no business to legislate in religious matters or for a state. The prospect for repealing the law is not good, the committee being afraid of the effect upon their political fortunes and desirous of allowing the matter to rest, when they will claim that lack of time prevented action. The average Congressman does not stand high in Mr. Putnam's opinion. The only one he met, he says, who impressed him as knowing much is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who lost one political job because of the ministers of the town. Mr. Putnam returned to Washington Wednesday, and will distribute his speech to the Congressmen and otherwise work upon their better natures to induce them to do an act of justice and redeem their fitting reputations. He then resumes his work in the lecture field. Through the Federation he will shortly acknowledge the generosity of those friends who by their contributions of money have enabled him to remain in Washington and force a recognition of Liberalism from reluctant lawmakers.

We thank Messrs. S. L. Hogan and Edward George, the former for 50 cents donation, the latter for $1. Also Mr. W. J. Locke for a long list of yearly renewals from his town, amounting to $34, and several others for new subscribers and generous renewals, whose letters of encouragement will be printed soon. We are exceedingly grateful for the assistance rendered us during the past three months, and hold a lively sense of obligation toward those who contributed in any way to our relief. Prompt renewals on the part of those whose subscriptions expire this winter will place us beyond the necessity of so often recurring to the financial part of our work.

With Our Congressmen.

News and Notes.

The twenty-fifth annual convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association was held in Washington last week, and the exercises were exceedingly entertaining. There is no question of the smartness of the average woman and her capability of ruling, as well as talking, in every sphere of human life. The essays and lectures were bright, witty, learned, and argumentative. Mrs. S. B. Anthony presided with dignity, equipoise, exquisit good nature, and womanly impartiality. Mrs. Anthony is growing handsomer every day—or year—and when she is a hundred years old she will be quite a belle. In her way she is a woman of genius, and very few men have made so honorable and glorious a career or done more good to humanity. Of course the argument is all on the side of woman suffrage, and some day these reformers will win the victory.

But these women, who hitherto have been so brave and earnest and ready to meet any question of universal human rights, are wily politicians in these latter days, and can be "artful dodgers" in a way that would do credit to any member of Congress, and in this regard I must speak more in sorrow than in anger. The following resolutions were introduced and at once the wild waves of excitement dashed to and fro:

WHEREAS, The Constitution of the United States promises non-interference with the religious liberty of the people; and

WHEREAS, Congress is now threatening to abridge the liberty of all in response to ecclesiastical dictation from a portion of the people.

Resolved, That this association enters a protest against any national attempt to control the innocent inclinations of the people, either on the Jewish Sabbath or the Christian Sunday, and this we do quite irrespective of our individual opinions as to the sanctity of Sunday.

Resolved, That we especially protest against this present attempt to force all the people to follow the religious dictates of a part of the people as establishing a precedent for the entrance of a most dangerous complicity between church and state, thereby subtly undermining the foundation of liberty so carefully laid by the wisdom of our fathers.

These are admirable resolutions and distinctly state the issue, and had the whole matter from the beginning been stated to Congress in this fashion I am quite sure it would have been effective. Whoever drew up these resolutions evidently understood the far reaching consequences of this illiberal legislation, and that woman as a citizen was as much interested in its serious results as man. Yet the women of the Suffrage Association were afraid to record themselves on this question of fundamental human rights. It wouldn't do to take a stand. The fear of the church was upon them, and so, after a lively debate, the matter was indefinitely postponed. What will the preachers say? was the main argument. How can we make a declaration against their claims? How can we antagonize the Women's Christian Temperance Union? It was said that the association being organized for the purpose of obtaining woman suffrage, it was entirely out of its line to state its opinion on Sunday opening. As a matter of policy, therefore, no action was taken. A few undaunted ones were in favor of simple and absolute right, but most went along the current of expediency. It was a sad mistake, and to my mind woman suffrage has received a blow from which it will not soon recover. If women pursue the line of expediency and refuse to help overthrow a great wrong how can they expect men to do otherwise? One might say, I admit the justice of the plea for woman's suffrage, but the prejudice is too strong, and as a matter of policy I cannot advocate the cause. What can these women reformers say, when they have pursued the same course, when they have shown timidity and indecision in dealing with an all-important question of constitutional rights? If woman thus forsakes justice before she has the ballot, will she not equally forsake justice when the ballot is in her hands? Can we trust women to improve politics when on a question of pure right they have not dared to express an honest thought?

If it comes to a matter of expediency I shall vote against woman suffrage, for with this example before me I am afraid that with the ballot in her hands she would vote for a union of church and state.

The church will never give woman the right to suffrage, never. She may bend and kneel and cringe, but the church in its very nature and theology is opposed to the absolute equality of woman with man. If woman ever receives the ballot she will receive it by the vote of Liberals, and not by the vote of priests; and yet to-day, out of the fear of priests the leading women of this movement for their own freedom have dared to take no stand against wrong. Can they expect Liberals to make sacrifices for their benefit when they have deliberately refused to speak a word for liberty? They call upon the working-women to unite with them, and yet there are one hundred thousand working-women in Chicago, typewriters, clerks, etc., who by this action are shut out from the noble and splendid inspirations of the World's Fair. Will not these women be indignant at the fact that this association did not dare to speak a word for their liberty and exaltation to highest advantages of the world's advancement? I am afraid the working-women of this country will think the National American Woman Suffrage Association is too aristocratic and select for their toiling thousands when it sees a huge injustice against them and is dumb.

The Liberal spirit prevails among the members of this association. If the resolution had been pressed it would have passed, but weak counsels lost to woman this glorious opportunity to exercise her noble privilege to stand for liberty. I hope for better things hereafter.

Rev. Anna H. Shaw made the closing speech of the convention, and although she is in good and regular standing in the Methodist church, with a few exceptions she made a sparkling Freethought address. She cordially indorsed Ingersoll's splendid declaration that all the use of a government was to maintain personal liberty. Said the Rev. Anna, "I had rather be free in perdition than a slave in heaven. I had rather be a free sinner than a bonded saint; for if I were free in the depths of hell I'd climb to paradise or know the reason why." This was received with unbounded applause. I guess the women will come out right one of these days and give the priests an unexpected blow.

The women have an institution here, with a most mystical transcendental name—the Wimodaughsis. I couldn't make it out at first. From what language originated this wonderful name? What's in a name? Oh, there's a good deal in this name—enough to make the masculine heart tremble. Wives, mothers, daughters, sisters—the first syllable of each of these names compose this supreme word—Wimodaughsis. The house so called is a pleasant gathering-place for social, literary, reform, and scientific matters. I listened to a lecture the other evening on "Chinese Poetry," by Dr. Collins, a missionary, I believe, who has lived for twenty years in China. The lecture was not only interesting, but Liberal from my point of view, for the speaker showed that four thousand years ago in China were all the essentials of the Christian religion in reality, passion, philosophy, and virtue. The love poems were beautiful, and there were poems of war, industry, and reform as noble as the strains of Whittier and Lowell, and as fresh and powerful as the majestic messages of Walt Whitman. How true it is that human nature is the same everywhere—that really there is nothing new under the sun—that even in Chinese literature four thousand years ago we find grandeur of philosophical speculation, noble pathos, tender passion, the exquisite and beautiful sentiments which are as immortal as the human race itself.

What about the Sunday opening? I can report no progress this week. The great orthodox lion is here, ready to growl if the slightest thing is done for human liberty. The committee are not prepared to report. I am satisfied that a majority of the House would vote for repeal if the question was presented. In the Senate, however, the fight is almost hopeless, and when it comes to the president there is another enormous barrier. The members of Congress are constantly besieged with letters, telegrams, and petitions from the well-organized Christian forces all over the land, and so fast and furious do these come that the impression is conveyed that a large majority of the people are in favor of Sunday closing. Some Congressmen have told me that personally they are in favor of opening, but that the majority of their constituents were the other way and that they might vote to please those whom they represent. I am satisfied that there is no real majority in favor of Sunday closing, unless in the Southern districts; but every Christian tries to make himself heard through the power of the great organization to which he belongs, while not one in ten of the Liberals is heard from. Yet, as a matter of fact, the real signatures in favor of opening outnumber by far those on the other side. I should judge there were nearly two million signatures to Sunday-opening petitions, while there are less than half a million on the Sunday-closing petitions. But the churches come to Congress not with genuinely signed petitions, but with organizations, and in this way roll up a mass of forty million names in favor of Sunday closing, and some Congressmen are fools enough to believe in this array of fictitious names. It is true, as Rev. Mr. Savage said to the committee, "Figures never lie, but liars will figure." There never was such a colossal lie on record as this lie of the Christian churches to-day. But this lie is producing a tremendous effect. It has the seven-league boots. It has the wings of an archangel, the voice of God, and the gall of the devil himself, and plays a bold hand, as if it held the royal flush. It takes a brave Congressman to "see" the bluff.

The House committee on the World's Columbian Exposition wrestled for two hours Tuesday morning last with the Sunday-opening proposition, and when it adjourned to attend the meeting of the House neither the Sunday-openers nor the Sunday-closers had secured a decided advantage. The result of the meeting, however, was not satisfactory to Chairman Durbin, nor was it promising of success in his efforts to have Congress rescind its action closing the gates on Sunday. The disposition of the members of the committee apparently was to leave the subject alone and not to stir up further agitation of religious bodies by bringing in any recommendation to Congress.

The discussion in the committee was discursive to a considerable degree, and frequently was not directed with definiteness to the proposition as it was embodied in the resolution before the committee, members offering suggestions as to the manner in which it might be possible to have Sunday opening in some modified form which would be less obnoxious to religious sentiment. Representative Houk of Ohio was one of these members who favored a partial Sunday opening. His idea, in a general way, was that the gates should be opened on Sunday afternoon, but that the public should be admitted only to the art galleries and to other kindred exhibits. He was also in favor of the proposed religious hall in which all denominations should hold devotional exercises.

There was more support to this view of a modified Sunday opening than to the kind of opening proposed by the Fair managers. Mr. Houk's plan also involved sacred music and a strict requirement that employees should not work more than six days in the week. Much of the time he occupied during the session was taken up in reading the long letter heretofore referred to addressed to President Higginbotham. This letter was largely in the nature of suggestions, and asked whether or not, in view of the opposition shown by religious organizations, it might not be that the receipts would be diminished by continued agitation, and it might not, on the whole, be well to withdraw the proposition. A letter was read from Fred Douglass favoring Sunday opening.

Such is the present condition of affairs. But we say to Liberals, keep sending letters, petitions, etc. It's no use to give up. Don't let agitation cease.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Business Notes.

New editions are now in press of Paine's "Great Works" complete, his "Political Works," and Ingersoll's "Liberty in Literature," to which we have added the Funeral Address, now for the first time in print.

Mr. Alexander's new book, "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind," showing that organized beings are the result of natural laws and shaped by their environment rather than the manikins of some huge creature created for his pleasure and governed by his caprice, is meeting with much deserved appreciation. It is just about what Liberalism needed to complete the philosophy which overthrows the Christian superstition. It explains Darwinism as no other work does except Haeckel's "History of Creation," which is too technical for general purposes.

We have received a new supply of "Government Analyzed," by the late Colonel Kelso, and shall be happy to supply them at $1.50 each, not $1 as previously announced. The work has created considerable excitement among the political reformers, and has much to justify an attentive study by those interested.

We shall close the collection of ministerial doings February 15th and proceed to the making of the book. Orders will be received if our friends desire to send the same with their renewals and filled as soon as the printers allow us to have the book.

Science and Progress.

Survival of the Fattest.

The young gorilla in the Berlin Zoo was getting thinner from week to week since his transfer to the new monkey-house, and has at last succumbed to the climate—or rather to the idea that health and happiness depend upon the careful exclusion of fresh air. Ear-aches and a penchant for bombastic speeches, however, are so compatible with longevity, that the Berliners may console themselves with the survival of at least one superlativ ape.

Profits of Superstition.

About a year after the election of Pope Alexander VI., Prince Pico de Mirandola held an audience at the Vatican, and was so amazed at the Rationalistic remarks of the Holy Father that he ventured a bold question: "In that case, why does not your holiness reduce the creed of the church to a pure Theism?" The vicar of Christ tapped him on the shoulder and conducted him to a room where a lot of Peter's pence boodle lay stacked up like wheat in a granary. "Look at that, my young friend," said the frank pontiff; "do you think it would be wise to discourage so useful a superstition?" The cogency of that argument still holds good. The "Grand Metropolitan" of the Greek church receives a yearly salary of 65,000 roubles. The archbishop of Toledo practically controls the revenues of 900 square miles, and some of his brother prelates in Andalusia and Aragon boast incomes that contrast strangely with the pittance salaries of Spanish pedagogs. In Portugal, too, the clergy has to be surfeited, no matter who starves, and the emoluments of the Anglican primates equal those of a German grand-duke.

Rapid Conversion.

Since the reorganization of the French army the supercilious tone of the East European press has undergone a change as remarkable of that of the Paris newspapers during the hundred days of the Restoration. "The monster has left his den;" "The usurper has landed at Frejus;" "The insane ambition of the exile hurries him from venture to venture and will hurry him on to destruction;" "Bonaparte has captured Grenoble;" "Napoleon has raised the tri-color flag at Lyons;" "The emperor is approaching Fontainebleau;" "His imperial majesty has entered Paris amid the acclaims of his faithful subjects."

Accounts to Settle.

"A falsehood," says Paley, "is a breach of promise, for whosoever addresses his discourse to a fellow-man, tacitly agrees to speak the truth, because he knows the truth is expected." What breach of contract suits will confront the orators of Jesuitism if the eyes of their fellow-men ever get opened!

A Proxy Stigma.

The Catholic clergy of the East-Austrian provinces are on their hindlegs with rage at the civil-marriage law. In Transylvania they appoint committees to watch every pair of lovers, and in Hungary they openly threaten to refuse Christian burial to persons who prefer the marriage contract of the law to the ceremonies of the orthodox church. The married life of the worldly-minded, they insinuate, will be denounced as concubinage, and their children denounced as Auswuerflinge ("whelp brats"). The philosopher Diderot summed up the whole grievance in a memorable aphorism: "An illegitimate child," he said, "is a wretch who dares to exist without having given the church an opportunity to make boodle nine months before his birth."

The Other Side.

The church papers of our Southern border-states affect a fit of indignation at the Sunday bull-fights of our next neighbors, which they maintain ought to be suppressed in the interest of law and order (the Sabbath Blue laws), but also as a common duty of humanity; and the henchmen of the ultra-pious governor of Texas plainly hint that Uncle Sam ought to try the arguments used in the abolition of the African slave-traffic and put a stop to the immoral proceedings on the other side of the Rio Grande. The sympathy of the orthodox may naturally champion the cause of the oxen; but suppose some Mexican moralist should appeal to the "common instincts of humanity" and preach a crusade against the Sabbath bigots who suppress popular recreations on the only day when nine out of ten workingmen find their only chance of leisure, and who thus drive millions of young men from the greenwoods and baseball-grounds to the dram-shop, from athletic sports to sloth and secret vices?

Secular Saints.

The graves of the most venerated men in almost every country of Europe happen to be those of Freethinkers: Voltaire's, Mirabeau's, and Gambetta's, in France; Bruno's and Garibaldi's, in Italy; Rousseau's, in Switzerland; Goethe's, Lessing's, Frederick the Great's, the emperor Frederick's, Schiller's, and Humboldt's, in Germany; Byron's, Burns's, and Darwin's, in England; and Joseph the Second's, in Austria. Louis Kossuth may find his last resting-place in exile, but if his remains should be transferred to his native land, his countrymen will not permit the evergreens of his tomb to wither.

Curious Hybrids.

The Darwinian theory at first seemed as irreconcilable with the phenomena of hybridism as Lucian's "slow and steady sunrise of culture" with the long midnight of the Middle Ages; but the alleged permanence of species has evidently been greatly overrated. Professor Karsen, of Riga, reports that the European roe can be readily crossed with several varieties of deer, and a correspondent of the Journal de Physiologie describes a "rabbit farm" near Angoulême, France, where M. Charles Roux succeeded in cross-breeding hares and conies—the hybrids having in several cases proved more fertile than either of the parent species. The Munich zoo exhibits a pair of lynx-kittens, and the Zoological Garden of Cincinnati, O., boasts a similar curiosity, a litter of wolf-puppies—the progeny of a gray wolf and a female Esquimaux dog. In more than one menagerie the union of tigers and she-lions has resulted in the birth of striped whelps. The ibex (steinbok) of the Alps has been successfully crossed with the common goat, and the male goat with ewes, and even with several species of antelopes.

A Cheap Luxury.

The counts Louis and Emile Vendôme, descendants of the famous marechal, are a curious pair: the one passes his time in entomological pursuits, the other in collecting "evidences of the Christian miracles." Count Emile is going to visit the United States before the end of this year, but is not apt to become a society pet, as he renounces all fashionable amusements for the pleasure of hunting insects. The illustrious savant ought to try a Bowery lodging-house.

Vices of the Age.

The besetting vices of ancient Greece were wine-worship and sensuality; of Rome cruelty and the lust of power; of the Middle Ages gluttony, drunkenness, bigotry, and mental prostitution (voluntary subjection of reason to faith); of the eighteenth century frivolity and gallantry, in the duc de Richelieu's sense of the word; of the present age dollar-worship and hypocrisy. The prevalence of joint-stock associations for the suppression of truth and the perpetuation of otherwise untenable fictions has reached a degree that clearly indicates the beginning of the end and the near advent of a better religion.

Green-Winged Angels.

The naturalist Walker collected a large number of talking birds for the purpose of testing their intellectual capacities, and after years of experiments now comes to the conclusion that his pets "do not attach the slightest meaning to the phrases they have been taught to repeat." Parrots would make model Sunday-school pupils.

Chronological Preference.

A medical journal publishes a "symposium" on the working habits of literary men. Some of the respondents confess that they follow no fixed rule, but write whenever the spirit moves them. Others prefer the early morning, or think it at least the best plan to finish the bulk of their work before dinner. Very few only recommend late hours; but, judging from the literary record of the benighted ages, religious writers evidently succeed best in the dark.

F. L. OSWALD.

UNLESS the authenticity of the historical books of the New Testament can be certainly established, we have no eye-witness of the Christian miracles at all; and, in the absence of such testimony, the adverse arguments derived from the uniformity of nature, and from mythological analogy, which traces the belief in miracles to the universal propensities of uncritical ages, rush in with overwhelming force. In fact, in almost any book written by a learned man who feels himself at liberty to say what he really thinks you will soon find the miracles abandoned, though it may be with evident reluctance.—Goldwin Smith.

"The Saturday Globe" and Thomas Paine.

The Saturday Globe, a rival of the Police Gazette, and a publication the would-be editors of which are provided with more boodle than brains for its production, has recently furnished the "our million readers," who thus "attest its popularity" and their intellectual inferiority, a column of lies and abuse respecting America's sublime savior, Thomas Paine.

When I attempt to think of the mighty struggles in the past for human liberty, of the long-time evolution of the Christian masses from slavery to partial manhood, when I remember that present comfort has come through the sacrificial blood of millions of sons of nature, then my body is shaken with Infidel indignation knowing how the skunks of superstition have squirted their noxious perfumes over the renown and memory of the most unselfish man, the noblest lover of liberty, and the most effective patriot of the last century.

I do not wish to be understood as asserting that one of the two proprietors of the said sensationalistic journal originated the article on Paine, for I hardly think either of them possesses mentality necessary toward such accomplishment. But as the infamous statements have been very widely circulated, it is deemed desirable in the interest of truth, or Infidelity, which is merely a synonym for honesty, progression, and happiness, that the impartial TRUTH SEEKER allow room herein to reply to the Saturday Globe. Certainly the most direct course to profitably refute slander is through the paper in which it appeared. But the managers of Police Gazettes are cautiously aware that if such papers print the truth concerning famous Infidels and Infidelity, a malady called lackofreaders will destroy their business, prevent success, and force them into an asylum or almshouse.

The scandalous article in question, a review of which serves to deepen our disgust for the priesthood and strengthen our pity for the laity, is as self-contradictory as man's revelation about God. We first read that Paine was a "Patriot Infidel," and further on that he "was a very bad man." We are told that after Mr. Paine returned to this country from France in 1802 he "found himself almost an entire stranger in the country, poor and friendless," and we are also informed by the same miscreant or lunkhead that Mr. Paine owned during this his time of poverty a "farm at New Rochelle which had been confiscated during the Revolution." It is probably difficult for one not an orthodox Christian to comprehend why a worthless farm was confiscated, and how a farm-owner could have been poor. We see Mr. Paine, "a very bad man," had been honored with the friendship and confidence of Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson. But enough of the self-contradictory parts of the villainous balderdash have been specified.

We notice that "William Cobbett, the celebrated English reformer, had Mr. Paine's bones disinterred," etc., but we do not discern it stated that this "celebrated English reformer" was himself a Paineite Infidel. So we wish to penetrate the brain of the Globe contributor, if possible, with Cobbett's words on Paine. They were, "I saw Paine first pointing the way, and then leading a nation through difficulties of all sorts to independence, and to lasting liberty, prosperity, and greatness, . . . Old Age having laid his hand upon this truly great man, this truly philosophical politician, at his expiring flambeau I lighted my taper." Evidently the Globe knew not Cobbett's, their "celebrated English reformer," opinion of Thomas Paine.

The villainous article calls Paine the "great assailant of—first, earthly kings, and then the King of Kings." If by the words "King of Kings" God is meant, then the Globe writer is either a scamp or an ignoramus. There is not living to-day a human being who has more belief in God than had Thomas Paine. I would advise the latest assailant of freedom's greatest champion to read "The Age of Reason," as he has not yet reached that period. Continuing, we read, "The history of Paine affords rich matter for thought, and his monument by the roadside is an object-lesson to the contemplative mind." Very true. Yes, the history of Paine exhibits the ingratitude of succored bigots, the relentless hatred of those who pretend to love their enemies, and the malice of hypocrites. But we ought not to forget that only until very recently have even a small part of the American populace been sufficiently Infidelized to appreciate true benevolence and love of man by man. The Globe's fabricator urges the usual orthodox arguments relating to Paine, and with a vehemence seldom paralleled. He remarks that Mr. Paine died "utterly friendless, and was buried by drunken negroes who sang his requiem in coarse and fiendish jests. To what a depth of degradation must he have fallen when only such characters could be found willing to bury his mortal remains, and even they regarded him with such contempt that they sang while shoveling the earth upon him:

"Old Tom Paine, here he lies,
Nobody laughs and nobody cries;
Where he's gone and how he fares,
Nobody knows and nobody cares."

Of such writers it is appropriate to say, "Of such is the kingdom of (priestcraft's) heaven." I am of the opinion that these late lies about Paine will as effectually keep little lambs from wandering from the Christian fold as the prophet-baldhead-urchin-she-bear story. Let us look at these last false statements philosophically. Suppose them true. Then we are compelled to conclude that the American people when Mr. Paine died, instead of being Christians who ever are notorious lovers of enemies, were surely beasts who neglected their illustrious dead, or, perchance, they were adherents of that clique of Christians who act upon that curious ancient suggestion, viz., "Let the dead bury the dead." The treatment of Paine living and dead by the American people is a dark blot on our national character equaled only by our former system of negro slavery. And no better man ever lived. History is powerless to set forth the equal of Paine in unselfish motives, nobility of conduct, capacity of discernment, grandeur in purpose, and immensity of world-benefiting achievement.

There is much more in the Globe article which perhaps ought to be referred to, but as time passes in penning these lines the writer is approaching that degree of disgust, caused by the calumny considered, that effort is required to linger longer on the subject. This latest falsifier of history, who says Paine was honored with the friendship of Jefferson, should have thundered in his ears what Jefferson said of Paine after he was friendless, poor, and buried by drunken negroes, etc. Here is what Jefferson did say—Thomas Jefferson the Infidel, he who wrote the "great Declaration": "You ask my opinion of Lord Bolingbroke and Thomas Paine. They were alike in making bitter enemies of the priests and pharisees in their day. Both were honest men! both advocates of human liberty. . . . No writer has exceeded Paine in ease and familiarity of style, in perspicuity of expression, happiness of elucidation, and in simple and unassuming language."

So we see that the great Jefferson could not agree with the gentleman who has lately pronounced Mr. Paine "a very bad man." It is always unpleasant to attack a skunk. Such animals should be homeopathically dosed with a pole-cat-o'-nine-tails, not with a pen.

English Notes.

After the summer season there always comes a period of repose in our English Secularism. Such a thing seems illogical, I will admit, but on closer inspection it will be found to be not altogether unreasonable. First of all it must be remembered that ours is a most unpopular party. As soon as a man becomes settled comfortably in the world and gets beyond the reach of pecuniary anxieties, he begins to feel an attraction to Unitarianism and other low-grade forms of religion which do not exclude him from social circles. He believes no more than he did hitherto, but suppresses the avowal of his disbelief and disappears from Freethought societies. The consequence is that our party is ever poor, since those of moneyed powers who are honorable enough to remain amongst us are few and far between. Nothing remains, then, but to work our branches on the most economical lines, to push our views in the open air during summer months and to forego the expense of hiring halls with the probability of small audiences.

It will be readily understood that large and enthusiastic gatherings under the broad canopy of heaven do not prognosticate similar meetings in a Secular hall. Ten thousand excuses, such as "Happened to be passing by and stopped to listen," come to the lips of those who feel they need apologize for their presence when they are caught in the open air. No such excuse avails them if they pay for admission and deliberately enter a lecture hall. Even newspapers can be found to chronicle an outdoor meeting which would never dare to report one within walls. So we have to cut our coat to our cloth—to knock off expensive and disappointing indoor gatherings and content ourselves with speaking by the wayside when the sun is good enough to shine upon us.

So far as those places are concerned where halls can be had (no easy task, I can assure you), a very fair amount of success is rewarding the laborers, especially where a due regard is had to public announcements.

Perhaps the most important thing to record in these days of comparative monotony is a new departure by the Rochdale branch. Many truth seekers will remember Rochdale as the birthplace of the famous John Bright. The town is very fortunate in many respects. First of all, it is only some ten miles from Manchester, which is the London of the north. Then its vicar is a very broad-minded clergyman of unimpeachable life and universally respected. The mayor, a Wesleyan by the way, is equally liberal and ready to take part in all good works. When I paid Rochdale my first visit last summer I found the Secularists in a disconsolate condition. They have a lovely hall which holds at least six hundred people. The expenses of the hall were covered by receipts from dancing classes and so on; but they much preferred using the place for its legitimate purpose, and were on the point of selling it to others who could make more use of it. My advent prevented that calamity. Friends turned up as if by magic; and regular Thursday night lectures and Sunday concerts with occasional addresses became at once the order of the day. Not satisfied with that the branch set about to see what was wrong with Secularism, that it did not become more popular amongst the masses. Briefly stated, it was considered that the program was too metaphysical and far too little practical. Men want measures, not theories. To teach men to rationalize morality, to dignify labor, to bring about the general well-being of the people, and so on, is very nice on paper; but it is not enough to get enthusiastic over. Men want more; they will have more if they are to have anything. And so the Rochdale branch set to work and drew up a program of active warfare, here annexed. They aim at:

1. Abolition of the oath and substitution of affirmation in all cases.
2. Repeal of the blasphemy laws and those concerning Sunday observance.
3. Compulsory non-religious education in all day schools drawing any government pay.
4. Abolition of all workhouse, prison, army, navy, and other chaplaincies paid for out of the public purse.
5. Compulsory civil marriage and an extension of the laws facilitating divorce.
6. Repeal of all laws granting to Christian churches, chapels, schools, and other such buildings an exemption from taxation.

The next step was to lay the matter before the Lancashire and Yorkshire Secular Federation, a combination of local branches of the National Secular Society representing about one-fourth of the area of England. This body met at Bradford last Sunday and discussed the program, adopting it with the following modifications. Point 3 was changed to "That education in all week-day schools receiving government pay shall be non-religious." In point 5, the words "Compulsory civil marriage" were struck out. This program now becomes the "object" of the Federation, and it will be laid before the councils of the Northeastern and London Secular Federations in the hope that those important bodies will see their way to adopting it, either as it stands or with certain alterations. In case of any change the amendments will be remitted to the three Federations in order to get a unanimous program, and the executive council of the National Secular Society will be asked to adopt it and give it forth to the world as the militant program of the United Secular party.

Our Bradford friends are looking forward to a lively work in the coming summer. Outside that famous town is a village of five or six thousand inhabitants called Baildon. Here but little Freethought work is possible owing to the bigotry of the people. Now it turns out that one of Baildon's daughters, who died in Australia, remembered her birthplace and bequeathed $125 to be spent in Freethought literature in that now interesting village. When it comes we shall startle the villagers with lectures and free distribution of good and useful books to those who attend. Our scheme is ready. Unfortunately, under our abominable blasphemy laws, it is all but impossible to get hold of such legacies.

SAM STANDRING.

James K. Magie.

It will give many Freethinkers a pang of sorrow to learn that James K. Magie died of heart failure on the 12th ult. He was then living at the residence of his son in Brooklyn. His demise was very sudden. A widow and four children survive him, one of whom, Miss Lizzie Magie, is slightly but favorably known to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Magie was for several sessions the reading clerk of the lower house of Illinois. He also edited various Republican papers in that state, and claimed the honor of being the first to propose Colonel Ingersoll for governor of Illinois. Political intrigues, however, prevented the nomination. Mr. Magie was a violent partisan, and in national campaigns usually took the stump for the Republicans. He was equally as earnest in religious as in political matters, and was a pronounced Agnostic. But through the pious inclinations of a business partner of his son the Episcopal service was read over his coffin. This was somewhat atoned for by the tribute of Col. D. A. Ray, who spoke a few words when the priest had finished, saying:

I have come here to join in a last tribute to a long-time friend. I do not come to talk nor to add words, in compliance with any formal custom of such occasions. I come because, of all the immediate neighbors of James K. Magie, I am one of those who has known him longest, one who has known him socially, politically, and officially for more than twenty years. I have known him and his family for so long a time that I seem almost to have known him always. But of his early life I can only speak from the knowledge of others. He was one of the people, one who always was with and for the people. He would voluntarily leave the association of the wealthy and the prominent to affiliate with and instruct those whose walk was with the laborer, the mechanic, the workman. He was ever seeking to elevate and improve the condition of the people. His own advancement was always secondary. Even where his personal pride and his sensibility was wounded he would hide the wound and await a vindication in its due time. He was a man of incisive and clear argument, of deep thought, and convincing speech. He was not always appreciated by those who criticised him, but in the later years of his life I had the pleasure of receiving from many of those who had formerly criticised him the most hearty approval and indorsement of his ability and power in the vocation which seemed most suited to him.

He came to be recognized as a most earnest, honest, and powerful advocate of the views he had espoused, and his family and friends could, if he left no other legacy, be justly proud of the record for honesty of purpose and simple earnestness which he has left.

He was nothing if not honest, when honesty meant poverty and want, and his grave could bear no more truthful epitaph than, "Here lies an honest man."

Mr. Magie was no humorist; he was no trifler. His best addresses and his most entertaining conversation were valued and valuable because of their seriousness and truthfulness, and not because of any element of mirthfulness or humor. He was quite as impressive in conversation as in his public addresses.

It may not be denied that he had his peculiarities and his hobbies, but any peculiarity which he manifested was always marked by its leaning toward the interest of the common people, the masses of American humanity.

With his views of modern theology, or his belief regarding the unknown future, although they are not mine, I have nothing to utter in criticism. His peaceful ending, and his statements at various times to me and to those who had his love and confidence, that he "had no fear of death," that he was "ready to die," prove to me that he had full justification, and left us in the fullness of time. A just life and peaceful death, who among us shall leave that record?

Major Magie enjoyed the acquaintance of many noted politicians, was employed and trusted by them, and was a useful person for the dominant party in the war of the Rebellion. In his home life he was kind and loving, and thought much of his children, who reciprocated his affection.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

Friedrick von Hellwald, the well-known German Freethought author, is seriously ill from inflammation involving the spinal cord.

In France local congresses are being held everywhere. In fact, an unusual activity is visible all over. But then, our French friends propose to have a voice in this year's election.

We call the attention of our Spanish friends to El Diablo (the devil), a comic political and Freethought paper, published weekly in Caracas, Venezuela, the editor of which is Lucas Gomez.

The Swedish state minister of religion and education has indicted Professor Harnack for giving expression to Freethought sentiments. The professor had stated in one of his lectures at the university that he doubted the truth of Christ's miraculous birth.

Lady Somerset, the English head of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, owns one thousand two hundred houses, and twelve of these contain saloons, says a Bristol, Eng., daily. That is nothing new: Rum and religion, church prominence and deceit, ever go nicely hand in hand.

In England, from October, 1891, to October, 1892, 12 ministers have committed suicide, 14 have broken the marriage promise, 17 committed various crimes, 18 misused animals, 109 violated women, 121 been indicted for drunkenness (habitual), 254 cheated their creditors, and 84 committed minor offenses.

That is 2.75 per cent of the English ministry, says the Pall Mall Gazette, who have in one year been in trouble with the law.

The Freethought society in Keil, Holstein, has a badge for Freethinkers. It is a needle with a head representing the sun, in the central point of which are the letters F. D. (Frei Denker, i. e., Freethinker). In our humble opinion either the Pansy or the Wettstein badge is decidedly preferable.

Bjornstjerne Bjornson, the well-known Norwegian poet and Freethinker, who for some time has played the politician, is, we are pleased to state, to give up the last vocation and devote himself to literature. The orthodox do not like this, for his works are altogether too Liberal even for a Liberal theologian.

The Free-Religious Society at Vienna, Austria, did not celebrate its Christmas, but more than made up by a splendid New Year's celebration. The forenoon was devoted to speech-making, and the evening to sociability. Whatever our friend Ed. Schwella, editor of Der Lichtfreund—whose biography we will give in the near future—takes a hand in is bound to be a success.

The Swedish Freethinkers are active, as usual. Lecturers travel through the country, and several discussions with clergymen have taken place. Christmas was celebrated in the usual fashion, with Christmas tree, singing, speeches, and music. The large hall was crowded to overflowing. Mr. Lennstrand must have entirely recovered his health. Besides editing his bright, crisp paper Fritänkaren he is of late delivering speeches almost every day.

In canton Bern, Switzerland, the Socialistic editor Steck was elected to the canton congress. He refused to take the oath, and the congress by a vote of one hundred and thirty-four against forty refused to allow him to make an affirmation. He has appealed to the Swiss Federation congress. Whether his side will be sustained or not, discussion and legislation upon the oath question will result. According to the Federal constitution no one can be compelled to perform a religious act.

At the recent international Freethought congress at Madrid it was resolved that the next congress should be held at Brussels, Belgium, unless otherwise determined later by the general committee. This last clause was due to a letter of ours in which we stated that the Freethought Federation would likely invite our foreign brethren to Chicago. Mr. Charlesworth's letter arrived at Brussels after Mr. Furnemont had left, hence was not known to him. But from later advices we are pleased to state that the general committee will, at its first meeting, act upon the measure, and, we have no doubt, report favorably.

The recent international Freethought congress, which in such a disgraceful and tyrannical way was broken up by the Spanish authorities, has thoroughly stirred up the Spanish nation. Protests and resolutions are raining down, and we don't know but that the conduct of the government has done Freethought in Spain more good than would a successful congress. Many people who probably had never heard of the existence of organized Freethought have become aware of it; discussions and investigations will result, the consequences of which can but be, in many instances, the kicking overboard of the orthodox superstition.

The Freethought Federation of America.

Elated with the success that attended my lectures in Spokane, I went on again the next day to Palouse City, where I was billed for three lectures. Three of our Palouse friends were at the depot to welcome me in their midst, but expecting to see a man more advanced in years, they allowed me to pass on to the city without it, although we became acquainted a few minutes later. This town is fairly swarming with Freethinkers. They are as thick as bees in a hive, and the meetings we had here were attended with such enormous crowds that the clergy were driven to desperate measures in order to cope with the "pestilence" that had come amongst them.

An incident occurred in one of their meetings which is certainly deserving of comment. One of the preachers, in consequence of the severe mental strain upon his poor benighted brain, was not feeling well when he entered the church. He acquainted his dearly beloved brethren with the fact, but added, "That if the Lord wished him to continue in the good work, and keep up the meetings, he (the Lord) would give him strength to do so, and sustain him in the work." Twenty minutes later the reverend gentleman had fainted in his pulpit and fallen to the floor. Although I sympathize with the gentleman in his hour of misfortune, still I thought the incident was rather suggestive. Evidently the Lord did not wish him to continue the meetings, and took him at his word. He had doubtless been humbugged enough with their railings of cant and hypocrisy, and took these steps to show to them his displeasure. Had this happened to me while giving my lecture, the hand of a supernatural providence would have been visible to them; but being a preacher, a servant of the Lord, it could be accounted for by purely natural causes. The preacher's name is Campton, pastor of the South Methodist church.

Our first meeting brought an audience that took up every chair, and each night the audiences were increased to such an extent that the seating capacity was not sufficient and many had to stand up. An invitation had been given to the clergy to attend and discuss the issue, but discussion being the better part of valor they made themselves conspicuous by their absence. The Freethinkers here are so strong numerically that all election issues are fought on purely local grounds, and the two contending factions are clericals and anticlericals—religion and liberty, Christianity and Freethought. The party of progress, Liberty, and Freethought have in the main been tolerably successful. They are now affiliating their forces with the Federation, which will give them all the assistance possible in future elections. An organization was formed after my last lecture, when about forty persons put down their names as members. The organization will associate itself with the State Secular Union of Washington for state issues, and affiliate with the Federation for national affairs. This is the way for us to work hand in hand. We can form a chain that the powers of darkness could not break through. This chain welded together link by link will assure us success. Hundreds of Liberals reside in the country immediately surrounding this little town, many of whom could not attend the meetings owing to the almost impossible condition of the roads. Nevertheless several of them did manage to get in, and every evening Mr. and Mrs. Drew could be seen entering the town upon horseback, rather than miss the lectures. Our equestrians had to ride a distance of eight miles each way, a fact which shows the enthusiasm of Freethinkers in and around Palouse. Our friends treated me with utmost kindness and consideration. Mr. R. J. Anderson and Mr. W. L. Farnsworth are outspoken Freethinkers, and both are, I believe, ex-mayors of Palouse. R. Pfandner, R. Crimmins, Judge Northrope, and many other prominent business men, comprising merchants, traders, and bankers, are reckoned among the Freethought hosts, and on the whole Freethought is having a real boom here. An amusing incident occurred here. One of our friends asked a native who had heard my lectures what he thought of them. He replied, rather naively, "I don't like that man." "Why?" asked his interrogator. "Well," he said, "because, he said that my God was a liar, and what is worse he proved it." Everywhere Freethought is in the air, groups are in the hotels, stores, and on street corners discussing "ligion."

I journey again to Reardon, where I am to give three more lectures. I arrive here upon an early train, but Charles Blake is here to meet me. Excitement ran high in this little town. My arrival was eagerly looked for. Mine were the first Freethought lectures ever given in this place and the people were anxious to hear about them. An hour before the time of meeting the hall was packed to overflowing. They came out in crowds, many had to stand up, and scores could scarcely crowd in. An evangelical preacher was present who, on the previous Sunday, had stated within his church that the "Infidels filled our jails, and all were on the way there, and those that were not in ought to be." I had been apprised of this and assured that he had really given utterance to the above statement. He had ventured here through compulsion, but as soon as my lecture was over he slunk away like a whipped cur with his tail between his legs.

I started in for him right away, but he was too much of a moral coward to get up and defend himself. He left town next day and was not seen again until I had got fairly away. At the conclusion of my first lecture Charles Blake said to him: "Now get up and say something. We had to sit and take your abuse on Sunday last, but you have had to sit and take physic to-night."

The next night the crowds were larger than ever, and some one had sent for a Mr. Pershall, a Swedenborgian exhorter, to come and "pitch into me." He did make a ludicrous attempt, but being totally unprepared for a discussion he did not wish them to think that he was attempting anything of the kind. However, it was decided that we discuss the question of "A Life Beyond the Grave" on the following night, as the gentleman assured us that he had made a thorough study of the question and was capable of talking upon it. The next night came. Early in the afternoon teams could be seen entering the town from all directions. Crowds came in from the country, and it was safe to say that every rancher for miles around had come and brought his family. The place was fairly alive with excitement and expectations were away up. Many of them came specially to hear me lecture and when they learned that a debate was to take place, and whom with, they appeared disappointed. Some of them announced their intention of returning home, and in order to keep them it was put to a vote of the meeting whether they should have the lecture or the debate. The vote resulted in a unanimous one for the lecture. So the debate was declared off, unless the other gentleman was willing to undertake it at the close. It was a real treat to see such an audience, many of whom had come miles to hear me, applaud and cheer during the lecture. The churches have received a shock here that they will never recover from. At the close the Christians tried to raise a disturbance, and here in this little Washington town the tables were completely turned against them. It was amusing indeed to see them piteously begging to be heard, but the crowd whooped and yelled with delight at their discomfiture and mortification. In this neighborhood Freethought is growing rapidly, the church has lost its power over the people, and the priest can no longer influence the people either by fear of punishment or a hope of reward. Charles Blake, W. H. Childs, E. H. Childs, the Garper brothers, Mr. Wickham, and scores of others too numerous to mention, are among the Freethought hosts here. H. L. Wilson and Peter Selde came all the way from Davenport to hear my lectures, and stayed in town until the close of the meetings. A good time indeed was afforded me here and I was compelled to promise that I would come again upon my next visit to this state.

Another list of names was added to the Federation membership, and liberal assistance was given me to aid me in my work.

The Federation and World's Fair leaflets are all over this town. They are good missionary documents, and should be widely distributed. They were especially pleased with the World's Fair leaflet, and it has certainly made a great hit here.

I wish to call to the attention of our friends that President Putnam is now in Washington to work for the repeal of the World's Fair closing clause. He has a hard fight before him, but buoyed up with the hope of success, he will conduct a strenuous fight upon that issue. Money is needed to keep him there, and for the fulfillment of the pledges we have given. We are in earnest about this, and our sole desire is to do what we have promised to do. We have made a good start, victory is within our reach, and once more I appeal to you for that financial help that will put it into our hands. Let us put our life and energy into this cause. It is a glorious one, well worthy of your support, and every Freethinker should help us to the extent of his power. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

Liberal Societies.

The Newark Liberal League observed the fifteenth anniversary of its formation and the birthday of Thomas Paine last Sunday in a becoming manner. Besides vocal and instrumental music there was an eloquent lecture on "Thomas Paine, His Life and Works," by Henry Rowley, of Brooklyn.

Mr. Rowley reviewed the life of Paine and related many instances to show his kind and magnanimous nature. "As an instance of magnanimity, I would refer you to his opposition to the execution of Louis XVI. Lover and preacher of liberty that he was, still he was opposed to the death of the man. 'Kill the king, but spare the man,' were his words. But the people of France had not the depth of thought to see that the institution may be destroyed without destroying individuals. This incident also shows his love for mankind." Speaking of the slanderous stories told by the Christian clergy of Paine's death, Mr. Rowley, in refutation, read the words of Cheetam, his greatest slanderer: "He died placidly and almost without a struggle." The lecturer related a number of instances to show how he was pestered by intruding people on his death-bed. "The same clergymen who pray, 'From malice and all uncharitableness, good Lord, deliver us,' denounce Paine as an incarnate fiend from the same pulpit. What is the reason of this deep-seated hatred? First, his unanswerable indictment of the Christian religion. Second, his complete refutation of the theory of biblical infallibility. But why is it Paine is so savagely attacked while such men as Tyndall, Huxley, Clifford, and Spencer, who have been much more thorough in their criticisms of bibles and religions, are not denounced? These men talk to the scientists, while Paine spoke to the common people. Voltaire and the Encyclopedists attacked the church and its clergy, but Paine was the first to take up the Bible and examine and criticize it, verse by verse." Mr. Rowley then took up the works of Paine and reviewed them separately. He showed how much the country owes to "Common Sense" and "Rights of Man." He advised those in the audience who had not already read the "Age of Reason" to immediately procure a copy and study it. "It is one of the best books that were ever written."

Mr. Henry Bird also made a few appropriate remarks. He said that Paine had done away with earthly kings, and if he were living at the present day he would do away with the heavenly king which he believed in. Mr. Bird said he had no sympathy with these people who are not satisfied unless they have a heavenly power, a divine power, or something of that sort. It seems to be a lingering hope which men cannot cast off. Among the other speakers were Mrs. Marian Smith, Dr. Wright, Mr. Gillen, and Mr. Walker.

Mr. Rowley, in replying to one of the speakers who had spoken disparagingly of Paine's life and death, said: "Supposing these stories to be true, what does it matter how a man died? We must judge him by what he wrote and said in the vigor of his manhood, and not by what he said on his death-bed, when pestered by cranks. He told the truth, and what he afterward said is of no consequence. In every right-angled triangle the square described on the hypotenuse is equal to the sum of the squares on the other two sides, even if Pythagoras would deny it."

On February 5th Mr. Oppenheimer will lecture, and on February 12th Hugh O. Pentecost.

Prof. Felix Adler delivered a special lecture at Chickering Hall last Sunday morning on "The Higher Life." As usual the hall was crowded.

Professor Adler began his lecture by remarking that there were not nowadays enough people who view life as a whole. In this respect he said we were greatly behind the ancients, and there are no men at present whom we can compare with Socrates or Plato. The ancients were much superior to us in another respect. While we are daily endeavoring to lessen pain, they cultivated the pain-bearing faculty. "They recognized that there will always be poverty, disease, and pain, and they did the opposite of what we do to day. The secret of the higher life is to cultivate the pain-bearing faculty."

Local pride or patriotism, the professor continued, may give birth to acts worthy of the higher life. But the higher life should be the daily life. In order to lead the higher life one must be familiar with both the higher and lower parts of life. The intellectual is the higher and the sensual the lower. "I do not mean to say that we should be ashamed of our lower life, but that we should keep it low. Let the lower life be but the means of attaining the higher."

"There are three tokens that are necessary to the higher life; they are purity, serenity, and wisdom." In speaking of the first the professor addressed himself mostly to the young men present. In speaking of the second he declared that there was no greater enemy of the higher life than impulse. "There is no such thing as good impulse."

Professor Adler will start on a Western trip, but will be heard in the city again in a short while.

Dr. William H. Von Swartwout was the lecturer at the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday night. The subject was "The Potency and Promise of Modern Science." The doctor undertook to prove that money was the source of all evil and that without money mankind would be happy. He said that in man there were the latent possibilities of a God, and as soon as mankind was released from the curse of money the happiness of the race would be assured.

Mr. Wilson McDonald was the first critic. He is a firm disbeliever in the doctor's theory and for the past twenty-five years has taken every opportunity to criticize Dr. Von Swartwout whenever he lectured. Messrs. Wilson and Sterling Wine also spoke adversely. Dr. Foote, president of the club, denied that the source of evil was money; he thought that the honor ought to be given to women. Mr. T. B. Wakeman defended the lecturer, saying that the doctor was one hundred years in advance of the times. Mr. A. T. Sullivan will lecture next Sunday on "Direct Legislation."

J. E. Remsburg lectured in Chicago Sunday night, January 15th, on "Sunday and the World's Fair." The Herald, Tribune, and other papers give flattering reports of his lecture. The Tribune says:

J. E. Remsburg of Kansas lectured last night before the Chicago Secular Union on "Sunday and the World's Fair." It was a presentation of the view that in the interests of the great majority of the people and especially of the laboring classes and of morality and education the Exposition should be open Sunday. He claimed that there was nothing intrinsically or divinely sacred in any day of the week, and that the Secular Union had as much right to compel ministers and priests to work on Sunday as they had to insist that the people should remain idle on that day. One of the critics of the lecture after its conclusion wished to emphasize the statement that the priestly Sabbatarian cry and crusade was arrant pretension and pure hypocrisy because the day they regarded as so holy was about the only day on which they did any work themselves.

During the last Exposition in Paris America, he said, was the laughing-stock of the world. On Sunday four hundred thousand people thoughtfully and religiously saw the wonders of science, the triumphs of invention, and the glories of art, and the little American exhibits were covered up with cheap calico. The act of Congress ordering the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday, he declared, was one of the most infamous and bigoted pieces of legislation ever enacted in this land. It was a criminal, puritanical, and inquisitorial attempt to create a union of church and state. It was a scheme of bigots and fanatics to legalize a Sunday-school fad at the expense of the culture and enlightenment of the people. It would be better for the profit and education of the masses that the Fair should be opened on Sunday and closed every other day in the week. When theology claimed the Fair should be closed he demanded in the name of intelligence and the people that it should be opened. The bats of bigotry and superstition have no right to obscure the light of this century's civilization.

The lecturer was frequently applauded during his discourse and a unanimous vote of thanks was given to him. The hall was filled, many of those present being women.

Westbrook Replies to Putnam.

MR. EDITOR: It is very evident that the Editor-in-chief of the late lamented Freethought newspaper, and the founder of the defunct Freethought Publication Society of San Francisco, has no hope of success in the lobby at Washington! He is terribly angry with certain Congressmen who have evidently "set down" upon him!

But why does he so unceremoniously hand me over to the "Orthodox?" Suppose the Orthodox will not have me; and suppose the Liberals will not give me up? Suppose I object to the transfer?

Now it is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether this liberal lecturer thinks I am a Liberal or not, or whether he thinks I was a hypocrite or not, all the while I was President of the American Secular Union. But I want to make a few quotations from the speech which was not read at the late congress of the American Secular Union, as I requested, but which was subsequently published (not in pamphlet) but in several newspapers, and which will show my real status:

Neither Congress nor any state has any right to pass laws regulating the religion of our citizens, because our federal Constitution prohibits it, in these words: "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." To establish the Hebrew law concerning the Sabbath, would be to so far establish the Hebrew religion; and to establish the first day of the week as a religious institution would be to establish so far the Christian religion—though they have no authority whatever for keeping the first day of the week.

In the Girard will case, Judge Story has decided that persons professing no religion, or those opposed to all religion, have just the same rights that those have who are thoroughly orthodox. The rights of Agnostics, Infidels, and Freethinkers are just as much sacred under our American laws as are the rights of Buddhists, Jews, or Christians.

If the United States has any laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution—or if any of the states have any such laws—let us labor with all our might and main to repeal them.

The several ecclesiastical bodies have a perfect right to pass rules requiring their members to observe the Sabbath-day as a religious institution, but they have no right to enforce such laws upon others—even if John Knox did travel to Geneva on Sunday and found John Calvin playing a game of ball. Martin Luther was right in advising people to dance, and to do anything they pleased—even to spit—upon that day by way of showing that the old Jewish Sabbath is not binding upon Christians.

If it be proper to number the hours of labor, it is proper to number the days of labor. If we have the right to say that eight hours shall be a day's work, we have a right to say six days shall constitute a week's work.

I have said nothing of a Sabbath or Sunday established by divine authority, because I know of none such. The stories in the Pentateuch are supposed by many to be very ancient; and we are often told that the Bible is the oldest book in the world. Nevertheless, I affirm that the five books of Moses were not written until after the return of the Jews from the captivity in Babylon, which was only in the sixth century before the Christian era.

If we admit the orthodox chronology, Moses must have been dead several hundred years before the Pentateuch was written. The fact is, that about all the Jews ever knew they learned in their captivity in Egypt and in Babylon. I could go into an elaborate argument, and prove this to a demonstration; but I give only one fact, which summarily settles the matter. No book in the Old Testament makes any mention of the stories of the creation, the fall, the flood, or any other matter recorded in the Pentateuch, that was not written after the return of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon; for the obvious reason that these stories were previously unknown to them. George Smith, of the British Museum, in 1873 dug up the cuneiform tablets which let out the secret that the Jews got all their stories from Babylon, and that these stories were well known in Assyria for at least two thousand years before Moses was said to have been born.

So far from the seventh day of the week originating with Moses and the Jews, the fact is that the day was observed by the Egyptians, the Assyrians, and other enlightened nations for centuries before; and it is distinctly stated in the "Records of the Past" that the Acadians celebrated the seventh day of the week eleven hundred years before the Jews had an existence.

Now I ask: Is it likely that God appeared on Mount Sinai, and wrote with his finger on tables of stone just what the most enlightened nations of the earth had known for centuries and centuries before?

The fact that the seventh day of the week was observed centuries ago as a day of rest, suggests to my mind the query whether there be not something in nature, something in economics, something in physiology, which requires the setting apart of one day in seven for other than our ordinary occupation?

We are not bound to admit the religious arguments of the Sabbatarians. The question has not been settled on religious grounds at all—though individuals have used religious arguments. The opening or closing of the doors of the Exhibition on Sunday is not even a moral question. It is neither moral nor immoral, per se, to open or to close the Exhibition on Sunday. It is only a local and temporary question at most. It is nonsense to say that because it is a "World's Fair," we should drop everything that is American about it, and accommodate ourselves to the notions and habits of those who may visit the Fair from distant nations. We should show them how we do things. Let us drop this petty local question of a few days, and turn our attention to:

1. The repeal or amendment of all improper Sunday laws—that is, laws which may be called religious.
2. Agitate the great question of the taxation of church property, in connection with other property, for the common defense.

3. Oppose the reading of the Bible in our public schools, and the offering of prayers, written or oral, and the singing of hymns or songs of a religious character.

4. Last, but not least, let us join in that grand effort being made by the National League, for the protection of American institutions, to secure a Sixteenth Amendment to our federal Constitution, which is as follows:

"No state shall pass any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking, which is wholly, or in part, under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

I close by emphasizing the fact that the Sunday opening question has been settled by the commissioners of the Columbian Exposition themselves. They were free to refuse the gift of $2,500,000, but they most deliberately accepted it and the condition upon which it was given.

Congress did not decide that the Fair should or should not be open on Sunday, but only stipulated that if the commissioners accepted the gift, they must not use the money in keeping open a Sunday exhibition; believing, as they doubtless did, that they were carrying out the wishes of their constituents.

All this hue and cry about "favoring the views of Sabbatarians" and the "union of church and state," is an empty sound, signifying nothing.

There are my real views. I am not responsible for what Dr. Crafts has said of me. If he can swallow the above extracts from my article I am content. My record is before the people, and I am willing to abide their decision. I have no favors to ask, and am able to stand alone, if need be. I wrote and stereotyped a pamphlet on "Church Taxation" and another on "Shall the Bible be Read in Our Public Schools?" when I was president of the American Secular Union, and by these I am willing to be judged. I have just issued the most radical book ever published in the United States, besides several other liberal works previously printed.

If Mr. Putnam persists in saying that I am not a liberal and never was, and that I am "Orthodox," and hands me over to the "God in the Constitution party," he simply does not speak the truth, or act fairly. If because I honestly differ with many liberals concerning a matter of mere administration, in regard to the World's Fair, I am to be denounced as a traitor, we need not go to Romanists or orthodox Protestants for examples of intolerance and bigotry.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $9.50 for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the following-named parties. I should also like my name and address enrolled on the books of the Freethought Federation of America. I am rather late for a man who has been working for the cause of Freethought for the last twenty-five years, but as the old adage says, better late than never. I have been and always shall work for the cause of liberty. If the Liberals of the United States would work half as hard as our opponents we would see a marked difference in the condition of our government. But give them rope enough and they will hang themselves.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to say THE TRUTH SEEKER paper that comes to my address as regularly as clockwork every passing week still holds its own admirably in giving its readers vast amounts of grand progressive scientific religion, free and Liberal thought, etc. I would like to keep each number on file, but, believing I can do greater good by placing them in the hands of other men, when I have perused each copy I lay it by until I get a goodly number, then, on some pleasant Saturday afternoon, I take them over to the main street and drop one each into selected farmers' buggies or sleighs; in this way I hope to do them and you some acceptable service.

MR. EDITOR: I at last have obtained two new subscribers to the good old TRUTH SEEKER. It is a hard and slow process to get people educated in mental liberty, but we will get them there yet. Inclosed find $10—$5 for the two new subscribers, and the other $5 for yourself or any good purpose you can put it to. You may send me one dozen of your Congressional eye-openers. I wonder if it ever occurred to Brother Putnam that the demonetization of silver was more the cause of the downfall of the paper Freethought than any other. It was for the reason that it made money scarce and almost impossible to get hold of, hence the failure of the brave little Freethought. I did all I could for it.

MR. EDITOR: We are pleased to send you $2 with liberty to use where you think it will do the most good. If not too late, it might go to help brace up the spines of those timid Congressmen, or to the bold yet gentle Putnam who seems to be close on to them.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 14th looks like what they call in prayer-meetings a quickening of the spirit.

I remarked to my husband that I had got a few quite interested in the paper, and he said he was afraid I should find out it would not come up to $3 worth; and that is about the way of it. But still I mean to "try and try again." I have been sending into Vermont this winter some of the most telling pictures. This may be a fire that will catch. Sincerely thine,

MR. EDITOR: I am putting up some buildings, and when I get through I think I will get a good supply of Liberal books and see if I can get people to read Infidel books along with the growth of our town.

I will send you $5 this time—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for the balance you may send me suitable literature for well-educated and apparently intelligent men and women who are not informed about science and Rationalism. Though they are Freethinkers, they are too much bound outwardly by conventional church and superstition. They do not believe in the church and yet they pay their money to it. They have no taste for Liberal reading. They live a false life every day of their existence. I regard those persons as the greatest drawback to our movement. For them our biggest cannon should be planted, our strongest force made to bear down upon them, and we should educate them into Rational thought. I hope to be able to send you a good many subscribers before very long. C. A. CANTONWINE.

Comments Ridicule.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1.50 for six months only, as I am, being a sailor, likely to leave the country during that time.

I have read your splendid paper about ten months, and I always look forward to its coming with delight, as I am sure to find some good reading and information in it. I certainly admire your bold and undisguised attacks on superstition and hypocrisy, and I also admire Mr. Watson Heston and his pictures of ridicule. I am sure that ridicule is the only thing that will bring a Christian to think about the absurdities in which he is thought to believe. It was through ridicule of the "Book" and its absurdities, that I became a truth seeker and investigator, and I can name many that have through ridicule thrown the "Book" and its superstitious teachings aside and followed the "Torch of Reason."

May you prosper and may you long wave the banner of Freethought, is the wish of

The Kind of Work That Indicates "Design."

Jan. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: As to there being any design in the world, I think it would be very strange if there were any in it when made in such a way as the Bible tells of. That is, that God in his infinit wisdom created all things and called them good, and then though unchangeable found he had made a mistake and man was going wrong continually; and so had to cohabit with his virgin daughter to get a son who should preach in parables, and deceive—for he says that one with faith as a mustard-seed can move mountains, while any man with sense as big as a grain of sand knows that if he had faith as big as the Rocky mountains he could not move a mustard-seed with it. Then that this godship says that if I will not confess him before men he will not confess me before his father; we are to believe all this and the fish story thrown in, and he that doubts is damned—if that is so you and I are "gone suckers sure."

Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER wave.

Distributing the Pamphlet for Opening the Fair Sundays.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 16, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have put that one hundred leaflets into the hands of different leading men and women of this city. But I could not succeed in getting a few of our best men and women to help me to anything like cash, to help me pay for them—though some of the more Christian folks would give me a damn, or if they would not speak it out, just in that way, they would think it all the same, when I would tell them that this was the first time that I ever knew the church and the saloons to be working together for the same purpose. And now, as these little leaflets seem to be stirring up the thoughtful, I have concluded to send down for another hundred, or as many more as you please for the $1.50. Of course, this is out of my own individual pocket, but I can see just where it is going, while in the latter days of our American Secular Union, when I gave my $5 a year to that institution I could not see where my money went, that amounted to anything. But in this case I can see that these little leaflets are doing a good work, and so I send for more, hoping that others may do likewise.

S. D. MOORE.

An Active Missionary.

CLAREMONT, MO., Jan. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed draft please send the grand old TRUTH SEEKER as per list. I have done the very best I could under the present circumstances to procure all the subscribers I could. But this place is truly orthodox, there being three churches to a population of three hundred, and only a few brave enough to express an honest doubt.

Last winter, through the columns of our local paper, I engaged in a controversy with one of the elect, which lasted nearly six months, and finally ended by the popular bigots threatening to boycott the paper. Of course I gave them the Infidel's objection to orthodoxy and the Bible in the very best way that I could present it, and, judging by the commotion it created, scored several points, and thus sowed the seeds which I hope in the near future will bring forth "an hundred-fold."

I found the "Text-Book" and the "Bible Analyzed" works which were invaluable for the occasion. I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, and expect to be as long as I am able to compensate the Brave Editor.

Yours for Mental Liberty,
JAMES F. LANE.

Who Wants Cacti?

EL RENO, O. T., Jan. 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to thank some kind friend for sending me the grand TRUTH SEEKER, having received it regularly since moving to this place from Dorchester, Neb. It is looked for almost as much now as a letter from father and mother, Jesse R. and Rachel Johnson, who are very aged. I am an old soldier, and not blessed with much wealth, and THE TRUTH SEEKER as a New Year's gift was truly a thankfully received present. My son Jesse sometimes writes for the Children's Corner. He and his grandpa always read THE TRUTH SEEKER clear through, and now it is the first paper read.

We came to this place for our health, and am glad to say it is very much improved. This is a very religious city. It has five churches and twenty-two saloons and nobody knows for sure how many bawdy-houses. But for all that, it will soon be a very prosperous city. One thing I have already found out is that nearly everyone with push and vim is not connected with any church. We have no Freethinker society here as yet, but hope inside of a year to have one started.

Keep Heston, keep the pictures, and keep a sharp lookout for the sky-pilots, and sooner than you expect Freethought will conquer. If anyone reading THE TRUTH SEEKER or his friends want for ornamental flowers any of the cactus, I will send them to them for just the postage—about eight cents each, or maybe less, according to size, and not charge them anything only for postage and packing and gathering. I will surely send them their money's worth, much or little. Wishing you success, I remain,
I. M. K. JOHNSON.

A Short Biography.

BERRYVILLE, ILL., Jan. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: As I have been sailing on that glorious ship of yours for some years, I have become very much attached to it. Not only have I sailed through and all over the great states of America, but also all over the Old World. Through my travels I have become acquainted with some of the greatest men of the world. I enjoy their company, and have but one way of receiving that enjoyment and that is by sailing with you.

I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER that Liberals from all parts of the country are testifying, or giving their experience. As it has become a practice and the roll-call has come round to me I will have to answer the call. I am not like some who claim to be thoroughbred Infidels or Liberals. My disbelief in inspiration has been growing stronger for many years. From my youth I have been a doubter, but did not have the courage to speak out my thoughts. I am now fifty-five years of age, and never have belonged to any creed whatever and never have had any notion or intention of joining any. When a boy I would go with my parents to church and hear the preacher speak of that endless hell where the sinner would burn forever. At night I would go to bed, pull the covers over my head, and think of that endless hell. Oh, what terrible feelings I would have! I would lie there for hours and could not sleep thinking of that awful place of torment. This hell business is one of the most damnable things which can be uttered by mankind. It has caused more sorrow, more grief, and more pain than can be imagined. I can not see how any sensible man can preach such a doctrine. It takes a soft-brained, selfish, impudent scoundrel to teach children that a just God will burn souls in hell for errors done on earth.

D. M. GADDEY.

Please Give One Answer to Prayer.

BRONSTON, TEX., Jan. 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The Briggs trial for heresy is certainly a grand thing for the whole world. Just to think that a regularly organized body of educated Presbyterian ministers should in the year 1892 decide that the Bible contains some things that are not true. We Liberals may take fresh hope and courage from this decision and persevere in studying the Bible as we would any other book, applying the same reason and common sense to it that we do to all others.

The Atlanta, Ga., Constitution—which is, except its theology, a most excellent paper—takes decided ground against the decision of the majority in the Briggs trial, and thus winds up a tirade against that decision: "We had rather believe that the Bible is wholly related to the truth than that the men who affect 'the higher criticism' are infallible." I would like to know what the learned editor of the Constitution means by the Bible being wholly related to the truth. Does he mean first cousin or grandpa or what? Who, I pray, are claiming infallibility except it be his holiness at Rome?

I think that the Christians should in all kindness feel themselves bound to convince the balance of the world that their God can and does answer prayer. Just give two or three absolute tests, similar to that said to be given by Elijah at Mount Carmel (1 Kings xviii). I tell you if they would do it they could in less time than three years with the present facilities of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones convert the whole world to Christianity. They need not take this as an idle banter or thrust at prayer. Just prove beyond dispute that there is a personality somewhere who, when a person prays to him, hears his prayers, and can, if it accords with his will, give him whatever he asks. I say in all candor and earnestness, Do this and you will convert the world in a very short time. I look upon prayer to an almighty God as the greatest power that keeps the masses in subjection to priestcraft. We ought to know the truth about this praying business. There is nobody but would willingly believe it if it was true. Now, gentlemen of the cloth, please just have one good substantial old hickory tree plucked up by the roots by prayer and cast into some river and I will be ever Adventure with the Devil.

JEANNETTE, PA., Jan. 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I get what I consider the most sensible and reasonable paper in existence, to the best of my knowledge, and that paper is THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is nearly one year now since I threw off the chains of superstition and became a man. Ghosts, devils, or anything in that line have no terror for me. Neither do I fear priest or preacher. As for Christian fanatics, I liken them to a dog barking at a ragman, because you cannot get any sense out of them. I study everything in the shape of Liberal reading, and the more I study the more I become convinced that there is no god. If there should be one or more he or they do not show themselves in any shape or form, or by works of any kind. There is nothing on earth or in sky to show a God's presence. Nothing happens, nothing is done, except what can be traced to a natural, human, or animal cause. The people in general give thanks to nothing for what good they themselves or some other persons have done them. And the poor devil gets all the blame for the evil that is done. But my opinion of the devil is better than that. And though I do not believe in dreams, yet one night I dreamed that the devil, a friend of mine, and I went to a dance together, and I found him a very sociable person. Indeed, he went so far as to oblige me by going home for an overcoat for me before the dance was over, as it happened to be cold toward morning, and he did not want me to catch cold. I do believe in devils, and I know seven of them in our own town—one in every church. They do more mischief than anything else I know.

In regard to the Sunday law, my opinion is that anything done in the name of the church is all right whether it is wrong or not, as this case goes to show. The Catholic church needed funds (they always do), so some of the young members got up an amateur dramatic company. Although they profess to keep the Sunday, the priest gave them permission to rehearse every Sunday, acting and dancing, with music, until they could appear before the public, and when they counted over the proceeds the leader of the company said he was ashamed to give the priest what he got because it was not over $100. Poor fools! Such people are worse than dogs, and ought to be kept like dogs with a chain around their neck, until like the worm they perhaps would turn.

I would like to have the address of your Greensburg correspondent, as that place is only five miles from here.

Please send me these books: three "Self-Contradictions of the Bible;" three "Was Christ Crucified?" one "Infidel Death-Beds;" one "The Case Against the Church;" three "The Logic of Death;" one "Epidemic Delusions;" one "Were Adam and Eve Our Parents?" two "Is There a God?" Bradlaugh; five "Two Hundred Questions Without Answers;" "Dialog, Christian and Chinese." Inclosed please find check for $3, and if there is anything left keep it. Yours forever against superstition, J. ADAMSON & Co.

Spiritualism and Christianity Alike Superstitions.

FLAT CREEK, LA., Dec. 13, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I purchased of the Oriental Publishing Company, of Philadelphia, two books called "Christianity a Fiction," and "Antiquity Unveiled." These are the first Spiritualistic books that I ever have read. They contain much valuable information, and in my judgment attack the Christian superstition in the right place and in the right way to destroy it. They tear off the veil of allegory and mysticism and expose the sandy foundation upon which theology is built. But I regret that these Spiritualists thought it necessary to fight the devil with fire, or to fight superstition with superstition. "Christianity a Fiction," by Dr. J. H. Mendenhall, is a masterly poetical work, and I believe that the author gives the real explanation of the Christian allegories, but the book ought to be accompanied by astronomical maps to enable people to properly understand it who are not learned in astronomy. "Antiquity Unveiled" uncovers many important secrets of the church. It contains many truths and much important information which is supported by history, but the many spirit communications embodied in the work have one individuality running through them all, which proves to me that they are all the children of one brain, and when Mr. J. M. Roberts represents the spirits as shaking hands with him I think he is spreading on the taffy too thick.

The God idea is a theory to account for phenomena. The idea of living spirits of dead persons is the same.

The God of theology is a creature of man's imagination by which the theologians account for phenomena. Man created gods in his own image, in the image of man created he them. The spirits are creatures of man's imagination by which the Spiritualists account for phenomena. Man has created spirits in his own image, in the image of man created he them.

I account for phenomena in a different way. I have become convinced by a careful investigation of nature and by hard thinking that there are no entities in nature except Electricity and Matter. John William Draper said some forty years ago that heat, light, and electricity produce all phenomena. Later developments of science seem to prove that heat and light themselves are only phenomena or effects and electricity the only cause.

When two suns or worlds are pulling against each other and holding each in their orbits they revolve around a common center of gravity in vacuity and neither goes to it. So I find that truth is always to be sought in the unoccupied space lying between contending forces, and if a man goes to it and takes his stand upon it he will be exposed to a cross-fire from both the contending lines. I have found truth lying in unoccupied space, a common center of gravity around which Theism, Atheism, Spiritualism, Materialism, etc., are revolving, and I shall not attempt to stay with it and defend it, where I shall be exposed to so many cross-fires.

It is entertaining to see two superstitions, Christianity and Spiritualism, engaged in mortal combat. The latter, being the younger and more vigorous, appears to be getting the best of the fight.

The Design Argument.

Jan. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please permit me to say that I have read your article on design with interest and profit. I have been much gratified by the kindness manifested by some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have received three postal-cards, nine letters, and eighteen pamphlets from persons no doubt concerned in my psychic welfare. I think that your very full and rich elaboration of the evolution theory does not in any degree whatever tend to disprove the existence of an intelligence coeval with matter. I am simply led to conceive of matter as being thus endowed because to my mind it seems absurd to think of an unintelligent ocean of matter (taking any definition) moving from cycle to cycle and all of this without thought. I have hence come to the conclusion that intelligence is a necessary property of matter. I do not mean to say that I believe that this intelligence is a certain malignant or kind spirit watching over us like the orthodox God. I have already briefly stated my reasons for this belief and until I can see some logical reason for the change shall not be able to think otherwise. As to the chief question I have no more to add.

Will you let me add a few words for the benefit of some of those who wish to help me to think out the problem? One kind soul tells me I am in a rut and then demonstrates that he is in a rut himself by again cracking the old chestnut, Who made the designer? My answer precedes in this article.

There are just two ruts in which this god question can move: first, the man-god; secondly, pure Atheism. Now, as I know of no one entertaining ideas exactly like my own, I hope my brother will think better of his statement. Another good soul sends me a copy of "Evolution of Animal Life," by Rossiter W. Raymond, Ph.D. I knew this gentleman to be a recognized authority, and so this morning I took my position in my easy-chair, book in hand, with a determination to learn—and with a feeling of heartfelt thanks to the donor. On page 143 I read with some surprise as follows: "Evolution does not exclude the divine agency, but simply presents a process in which that power may act as truly as in the process of birth." Again: "In short, the whole controversy can be carried on perfectly well by Atheists or by Theists on both sides; and the odium antitheologicum as well as the odium theologicum is quite out of place in it." This position is made still stronger by further comment. Had my good brother read it himself he would not have favored me with the copy.

The point is that evolution surely does not controvert the idea of a superintending intelligence, but it is only a plan of creation instead of a discussion concerning an author. Although apparent breaks occur in this plan, still the whole presents an unbroken cycle of everlasting development. Upheavals come and the work seems retrograding. Yet time shows it to be a part of this intelligent design, ever arching up higher, throwing its banners of prophecy still wider, so evolving the predestined ultimata of design—that even man may at last predict the future by observing plans of Nature's laws of the past. The view, then, that is presented by this panoramic advance (I do not like dynamic) seems to me to warrant the presence of intelligence. Fraternally,

BELVIDERE, ILL., Dec. 19, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: It begins to look as if those who propose to attend the World's Fair are not to have any right or title therein, and that their interests and wishes are not to be consulted at all, but that it is to be run in the interests of saloons and other vicious institutions under the guidance of Sabbathites of antiquated intellects. Too late we find that by a combination of saloonists and Sabbathites the Fair gates have been bought, with the assistance of a lot of long-eared statesmen, for the sum of $2,500,000. And now railway managers tell us that they mean to charge us full fare except that on slow trains there will be a discount of twenty per cent. That means that if we are willing to be shipped in on cattle trains like hogs they will throw off twenty cents on the dollar. One would reasonably suppose that if they mean to treat us like hogs they would be willing to take hog prices. Now, do the Fair managers take the people for fools to suppose that in these enlightened days they will submit to be loaded around by any combination of Puritans and rum-sellers? Do they think that they can slam the gates shut in our faces and drive us like sheep into their churches and saloons whether we will or not, or take our choice of wandering aimlessly up and down the streets of Chicago or sweltering in hotels and boarding-houses all day? Do the Sabbathites imagine that they can thus deliberately swindle us out of our time? Do railway magnates think they can do the same with our money? Do they really think that we are so very innocent that we won't kick? If they do, then they will find themselves grandly mistaken. Now, we can easily understand why saloonists and owners of disreputable dives are in favor of Sunday closing, for it means to them an immense sum of money that they will get from the multitude in consequence of their being shut out of the Fair; but what object the Sabbathites have in view is hard to say, unless it be that the more damage the devil does the more employment it will give the parsons in repairing the damage. But on the constitutional grounds of equal rights and privileges to all men we defy them to produce the ghost of a reason. Do we attempt or even wish to compel them to go to the Fair on Sunday? Not at all, for we cheerfully accord to them their full constitutional privilege of spending the whole day in church if they want to, or if they prefer they can spend it in any saloon or immoral dive if they want to, or they can spend all their week-days in either church or saloon, if they want to—we will not interfere with their taste or privilege a mite. All that we ask is that we shall not be compelled to accompany them in their choice of pleasures. All that we ask is that we be given the same constitutional right that we accord to them of choosing our own way of enjoying ourselves on Sunday. But the Sabbathites are determined that we shall not choose our own way of enjoying ourselves that day, and to make doubly sure that we shall not they have secured control of the Fair gates.

Well, what are we going to do about it? If everyone who feels the gross injustice of this Sunday-closing scheme will do as I propose to do, we will do just this: We will give the Fair a good letting alone. The Sabbathites can devote one of the immense buildings to prayer-meeting purposes, the saloonists can set up their saloons in another, and they can mutually comfort each other, and pray and drink whisky to their heart's content, and we will not molest them. They and their Fair can all go to Halifax for all we will interfere. We will let them know that though they may be able to shut us out of the Fair, they will never be able to make us go there. Now, I had set my heart upon attending the Fair and spending on it considerable time and money. My plan of doing so was this. I find that my business occupation is of such a nature that I must attend to it five days in the week. In a pinch I might make four days do. So I proposed to go in on Friday night, enjoy the Fair on Saturday and Sunday, then come home on Sunday night, and attend to my business the rest of the week. By repeating this process at different times during the summer I would be able to see a good deal of the Fair. Of course, to economize my time I would want to get access to the Fair on Sunday, and to economize my cash I would want cheap rates to the Fair; but if the Fair and railway managers propose to beat me out of both then I shall be compelled to abandon my purpose, and instead of going to the Fair to spend money I will stay at home and save it. Now, I am certain that there is a vast multitude of people who are situated exactly as I am, and will do exactly as I propose to do if balked in their purpose. Now, we will not do this from any design to boycott the Fair, but from necessity, and a determination to save our time and protect our pockets from any combination that proposes to beat us out of either. We have petitioned and petitioned, but alas, to no purpose! For a lot of narrow-brained Puritans whose befogged consciences will not allow them to enjoy in a pure and common-sense manner the day called Sunday, are determined (dog-in-the-manger like) that no one else shall enjoy it, and so for the sum of $2,500,000 the Fair managers have yielded to their wishes. It is certain that the managers have made a bad bargain. Far better that they had spent that much less money and remained unfettered. Then by opening the gates on Sunday they would have perhaps doubled their receipts; and have better pleased the majority of the visitors and lessened crime and immorality by furnishing the masses a more healthy place to spend Sunday than in grogshops and other vicious places. But if it is now too late, and if the Fair managers conclude to persist in their blunder, then they must expect the most stupendous failure on record.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Walt Whitman.

The voice of the singer is mute,
And broken the string of his lute.
He's passed from our calling and ken,
From the poor crowded lives of men,
And the world is lonely to-day,
Since he's laid in silence away.

But we whom the singer has blessed,
Whom he gave his brightest and best,
We, heirs of all good that has been,
Whom he dowered with wealth of his pen,
We know that our bard cannot die.
Though silent and quiet he lie.

He sings in the voice of the breeze
As it whispers and plays through the trees,
He sings in each jubilant note
That swells from the meadow-lark's throat,
In the hum of the bees passing by,
In the blue of the deep summer sky.

Though hidden away from our eyes,
In the great heart of Nature he lies
And sings for us still in her voice,
Bidding all with her gladness rejoice.
Nor grieve for the days that are past,
But trust to her wisdom at last.

For the great and the small upon earth,
All the life that her life brings to birth,
Go back to her bosom at length,
Go back in their weakness or strength,
And she folds them in silence away
To rest after life's busy day.

None can say on what morrow they wake,
Nor the paths that their parting feet take,
But the worst of the earth and the best
All must pass to this calm, dreamless rest,
So it cannot be evil I think,
This hemlock, which all men must drink.

Birthday.

TO GEO. M. DAVENPORT ON HIS SEVENTY-FIFTH BIRTHDAY.

I am content
To let the added years
That come to me
Roll back into the past so far,
That memory
Can only find along the shore
Some perfect shells and nothing more.

I am content
That seaweed, bits of wreck,
And pebbles gray,
Drift out of sight into the sea.
For them to stay
Would be to cherish grief and pain,
I would not, must not, feel again.

I am content
That none of life
Can ever be Lived o'er with selfsame throb and thrill.
Nevermore to me
Will former song, or book, or toy,
Trill the same measure of my joy.

I am content,
For age upon this heart
Can never creep.
And when, at last, in stillest night,
I seem to sleep,
A birthday comes to me in truth—
The gift it brings—immortal youth!

One World at a Time.

It is quite enough and contains all the material with which we are able to cope. It is of vital importance that we engage in doing the work that lies nearest at hand. And it is not necessary that we waste our precious time in discussing whether we have immortal souls or not. If we have and they are destined to live on for countless ages, it is all right. If such is not the fact, we have no need to worry, and the one dispensation of nature is as beautiful and correct as the other. The eternal laws of nature are as worthy as they are inexorable, whether they suit us or suit us not. Our place for the present is here. Whichever way we turn many wrongs confront us. Work awaits us everywhere. Silly superstitions, a foolish and ignorant caste, a great deal of bigotry and intolerance, exist all over the world. Ignorance prevails, and many grope in darkness. Theft, arson, murder, and many high crimes and misdemeanors take place daily. This world should be a far better place than it is. It requires the mite of your help and mine to make it so. A hasty glance over the array of reforms before us is quite sufficient to show that

One world at a time is all we can manage; More would result in a great disadvantage.

Square.

I have not kept my square; but that Shall all be done by rule.

I think many of us are like Shakspeare—we have not kept our square—have not done the square thing, the right thing, the best thing, at all times; but we will keep trying to live more and more up to the rule of squareness and bestness.

The carpenter could not build a good house without his square, and neither can we build a good life unless we square our conduct by good rules. Be honest, true, and square.

A great many of our games are played on boards laid out in squares. We have public squares of green grass and trees in cities. Then there is what is called the "magic square"—a series of numbers in a regular progression disposed in parallel and equal rows in the form of a square, so that each row taken vertically, horizontally, or diagonally shall give the same sum, as:

AUNT ELMINA.

A Queer Pet.

At the Valley Falls home of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Chase, the reformer, well known in this city, there was recently a visitor that attracted great attention. It was a pet butterfly, which was with Miss Abby Gove, who lives at Hampton Falls, N. H., in the house where Whittier died.

For several summers past, previous to his death, John G. Whittier passed the season at Hampton Falls at the old Gove homestead. The only member of the old name now left there is Miss Abby Gove, to whom Whittier was greatly attached. The day following Whittier's funeral, which service was held in the old house, Miss Gove opened the windows of the quaint, old-time "keeping-room," and following the burst of sunlight and summer breeze came a large golden-brown butterfly. It lighted on the casement, its pulsating wings a bronze dazzle of color.

Miss Gove gave the tiny guest welcome, and left it to enjoy its rest. The following day it was there just the same, and it flew about the room making light, graceful poises between its flappings. Three days passed, but the butterfly remained. On the fourth day Miss Gove took it, with gentle touch, putting it outside the window, thinking perhaps it might have forgotten its way to liberty. But on the next day, when the window was opened, the little guest came back. Twice afterward it was put out but it invariably returned.

Miss Gove then took a plate and one of the old-fashioned wire screens, such as are associated in one's mind with the cheese-dish on the farmer's dinner-table, and taking the butterfly she put it on the plate, covering it with the screen. It seemed contented and happy. Food was required for it, so its owner bought a toy cup in which she mixed honey and water, and this the tiny insect evidently approved. A new cage like that used to house canary-birds was bought and around it a piece of fine wire netting placed. This is the butterfly's permanent home now.

It has learned to know and to be fond of Miss Gove. When she opens the door of the cage the butterfly poises at once on her outstretched hand, and while there makes a purring noise, exactly similar to that of a contented kitten, only of slightly less volume of sound. If anyone comes near Miss Gove the insect flies away, seemingly much perturbed, but when the stranger withdraws it returns to her hand, resuming its happy purr.

Its mistress now always feeds it. Its method of absorbing its food is this: The cup of honey and water being held in the hand of Miss Gove, the butterfly lights on her finger and runs out a needle-like proboscis an inch and a half long; this it thrusts into the liquid, curling it around on the surface of the substance; then it thrusts, with quick strokes, the end of this natural tube into its mouth. When it has eaten all it wants, the proboscis is drawn in, and it is then the purring is loudest.

Correspondence.

AUSTIN, NEV., Jan. 16, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Seeing our cause is speeding on I thought I would try to make it speed a little faster. With the help of Ingersoll, Heston, Wettstein, and others, we will make our mark in the world. Where I live some are afraid to express their belief, but I am not. I never waste my breath with any of the pope's followers. They say, "You will be damned if you curse the priests." Well, to tell the truth, if there was a God, and if he came before my eyes and said, "Here I am," I would not worship him. I am going to be independent as I live. My teacher at school is one of the lambs, and is always talking about his one-horse God, but will never convert me. If we have a majority for president in the future it will be by hard labor. I have the complete works of Shakspeare, but in all the works no God is apparent.

My father has many debates, but not one of the holy can solve one of God's problems.

Well, with good luck for the New Year I will close the letter I shall have to answer in the resurrection for.

Yours for truth, HARRY MOSS.

[Always be brave and independent—true to the right as it appears to you. Every day we are more and more proud of our boys and girls. Their hands are to uphold the banners of Freedom when older hands drop them.—Ed. C. C.]

LEWISPORT, KY., Dec. 22, 1892.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I believe it is true, as said, "old folks like to talk of themselves." When I was a child, my good mother joined the Presbyterian church. After a while she concluded to have her children baptized. I was the eldest. When they commenced to make the little ones cry, I got my eldest sister by the hand; away we went to the garden. They sent our old nigger man, Uncle Ben, after us. We hid in the grapevines (much like Adam and Eve, I ween). Uncle Ben came up. "I will tell them I can't find you," he said—the best lie I recollect now. As I think at this age of seventy-eight it is a misfortune to tie a string on mind or neck. When we join a creed we make our last will or testament; it is a good deal like having your life insured, paying some corporation to take care of your money, which prudence would care for so cheaply. Just so, if we do what is right, we never need repentance. Repentance can never put anything where it was before. The clergy talk much about the stool of repentance. I hope our children won't need that stool. Go ask that tender woman when this stool was an easy seat in church or out of it. A misguided confidence! As for us her mistake, if she made one, can't hurt us, but it puts money in the pockets of the corporation called fathers, unmarried, and reverend. Why are they reverend? Are they not made of the same clay as the rest of us? The world seems to be weighted down with titles, but whoever deserves the title of honest child will most surely desire to be an honest man or woman, whose walk will be erect and whose step will not be weighted down with dreams of fear and cowardice. Stand erect, little children, keep out of debt. Debt never added to a solitary comfort of mankind. You were not born in debt. You could not contract so heinous a crime. No state can morally contract or aid so great a misery, adding the dogma of church to state.

GEORGE SMITH.

FENTON, MICH., Jan. 16, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Corner, if you would let me in.

I live on a farm of one hundred acres, five miles south and east of Fenton. My grandfather has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly thirteen years; and we have the numbers of five years bound. He has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER so long that he thinks he cannot do without it. I always read the Corner and enjoy it very much. I, as did Gertrude, missed you from the Corner, but enjoyed the pieces about your voyage. I will now tell you what I received for Christmas: I got a gold watch and chain, gold eardrops, a violin, an autograph album, a lovely little purse, a book, a handkerchief-box, and a necktie. What did you get? Grandpa gave me my watch and chain. I have always lived with him and always shall unless something happens more than I know of now.

The other day a lady friend of mine was here and we got to talking about Christianity and about being posted on the Bible. She said she had read Genesis and got so disgusted she stopped. I did not get it all read; I read to where the world was made out of nothing and then I stopped. That was too big to swallow—don't you think so? Well, Miss Wixon, if you or any of our Liberal friends come to Michigan I should be pleased to welcome you or them. I have one of your good books entitled "The Story Hour," which I have read a good many times. I also like Helen H. Gardener's works. I have two of her books; one is "A Thoughtless Yes," and the other is "Is This Your Son, My Lord?"

Bertha E. Weed, please ask your grandfather if he remembers a man that used to live in New York by the name of S. H. Ellinwood. Tell him the same gentleman still remembers him yet and he enjoys your letters very much.

Well, I will close for fear of that dreadful waste-basket. From WILD ROSE.

[We are pleased to get such a nice letter from a "Wild Rose" in the winter. She must be quite a favorite to receive so many beautiful presents. We were remembered by many friends in useful, substantial, and ornamental ways, but the love that accompanied the gifts was more valuable than all.—Ed. C. C.]

BLASPHEMY.

Argument by R. G. Ingersoll in the Trial of C. B. Reynolds, at Morristown, N. J. This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled in a trial for "blasphemy." Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 333 pages. This is beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly calendered, and richly tinted the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published works, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fiske, Elizabeth Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," Love, Liberty, Art and Morality, Science, Nature, The Imagination, Decoration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny, "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual Liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

Prices.—In cloth, beveled boards, gilt edges, $2.50; in half morocco, gilt edges, $5; in half calf, mottled edges, library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible finish, $9.

Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, $1.25. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

Priest and Man.
A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,
Author of the "Iliad of the East," etc., etc.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not have been ashamed to own as her first novel. A more vigorous representation of the mischievous nature of modern Christianity, in its most honest and consistent form, need not be desired. [Westminster Review.]

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin.
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.

Gems of Thought.

WE should conduct ourselves toward others as we would expect them to act toward ourselves.—Aristotle.

WOULD you be avenged of an enemy—be virtuous, that he may have nothing to say against you.—Diogenes.

LET us be unremitting in our endeavor to acquire new virtues, and never be satisfied merely with those we have already attained.—Confucius.

To conquer ourselves is the means for us not to be overcome by others, to be masters of ourselves is the way not to have other masters.—Chinese Author.

THE best office that literature renders a nation is to keep it vividly acquainted with its history, and to give that history its true interpretation.—Parton.

WE should desire nothing but what is right, and contribute by our example to the maintenance of good order in society, and everyone should conform to this good order.—Cicero.

RELIGION, raging with inhuman zeal, Arms every hand, and points the fatal steel.

Whatever names divine the parties claim, In craft and fury they are both the same.—Voltaire.

I HAVE not so surely foreseen that any Cossack or Chippeway would come to disturb the honest and simple commonwealth, as that some monster institution would at length embrace and crush its free members in its scaly folds.—Thoreau.

WHEN Voltaire was born the church ruled and owned France. It was a period of almost universal corruption. The priests were mostly libertines, the judges cruel and venal. The royal palace was a house of prostitution. The nobles were heartless, proud, arrogant, and cruel to the last degree. The common people were treated as beasts. It had taken the church a thousand years to bring about this happy condition of things.—Ingersoll.

YOUR poems have qualities which render them respectable, and worthy the admiration and study of honest people. They form a course of morals wherein one can learn to think and to act. Virtue is painted therein in the most beautiful colors. The idea of true glory is clearly defined in them; and you insinuate a taste for the sciences in a manner so fine and so delicate that whoever has read your works cherishes the ambition to follow your footsteps. How many times have I not said to myself, "Unhappy man, lay down a burden the weight of which is beyond your strength; no one can imitate Voltaire unless it be Voltaire himself!" At such moments I have felt that the advantages of birth, and the halo of grandeur so flattering to our vanity, are things of very small account, or, in truth, of no account at all. They are distinctions foreign to ourselves, which adorn only the exterior. How far preferable to them are mental gifts! What do we not owe to persons whom Nature herself has distinguished by merely making them what they are! She pleases herself in forming some men whom she endows with all the capacity necessary for carrying forward the arts and sciences; and it is for princes to recompense their toils.—Letter of Frederick the Great to Voltaire.

IN the broadest sense, Evolution is the theory that all the varied details of the universe are the result of a gradual development from simpler conditions, through the working of the laws of nature which now surround us. Worlds, minerals, plants, animals, man, language, morals, laws, literature, arts, and sciences, as they exist to-day, are the outcome of the unceasing successions of cause and effect that have taken place, through the preceding ages, in accordance with natural law. But the term as popularly used refers more especially to life, and in this sense, Evolution is the theory that all existing forms of life have been produced from simpler forms by a gradual process of change. Instead of an unchangeable universe continuing just as it was first created, the Evolutionist, seeing constant variation in each kind or species of plants and animals, has learned that these variations may increase, until, in a long course of natural descent, forms are produced that appear to be distinct species. In the breeding of domestic animals and in the crossing of plants, such marked differences result in a short time, that it becomes certain such variation continued through a long period would produce forms appearing to differ in kind from their ancestors. It is therefore seen to be both possible and probable that all existing forms of life have developed from a few simple forms, or even from one form, by slow processes of change continued through vast ages.—Robt. C. Adams.

News of the Week.

THE New York city rabbi who was expelled for eating ham, in revenge accuses the president of the congregation of robbing the synagog poorboxes.

THE Catholics of Italy are petitioning in large numbers against the bill for giving the civil marriage rite precedence over the religious ceremony. The measure was rejected by the senate in 1880, when a hundred thousand Catholics petitioned against it.

IN Ireland the province of Ulster has again been holding great meetings and announcing its unalterable resolve not to submit to a Dublin parliament. A million and a half of Irishmen, mostly Protestants, are now again protesting against the rule of the priests.

AT Des Moines, Ia., the 25th ult. was like a Sunday. The revival meetings conducted by Rev. B. Fay Mills had reached a climax, and the business houses big and little closed and the people united in religious services. The conversions for that day alone numbered hundreds.

THE Catholic congress at Quito, Ecuador, resolved "That the Supreme Pontiff has received his authority, not from man, but from God, and ought consequently to enjoy perfect independence and absolute liberty in the exercise of this authority, and should not be in any way dependent on any earthly power."

THE prime minister of Spain has yielded to the loud cry raised in all parts of the peninsula by the people of all classes, including bishops of all dioceses and nobility, religious confraternities, and workingmen's clubs; he has consequently assured the nuncio of his holiness Leo XIII. in Madrid that the Protestant New Temple shall not be opened until all exterior signs of every kind to attract attention have been removed. All this means a delay of some months, besides a considerable expense in the radical alteration of the facade.

IN Holy Russia the sufferings of the people are growing worse than ever. The misery from want of food and fuel, and from epidemics of all kinds, is indescribable. A foreign consul at Odessa writes that the "people are dying off as flies die at the end of summer." Commercial prospects have been looking blacker each month since the Jews were expelled in deference to Christian fanaticism. The government is uneasy over the bankruptcy of many prominent houses. "We find ourselves," says Count Bobrinsky, "face to face with a bad harvest under worse circumstances than last year."

JAMES G. BLAINE died at Washington, D. C., on the 27th ult., of kidney disease, complicated with tuberculosis. The immediate occasion of death was heart failure. His mother was a Catholic, and he was baptized as one, and served mass in church as a boy. When he reached manhood he joined the Presbyterian church. He was a regular attendant at his church, and during his illness was visited regularly by his pastor, Rev. Dr. Hamlin. His last spiritual conversation was with that clergyman. "He died," say reports from Protestant sources, "a firm believer in Protestantism." However, Catholics are claiming him. As one instance, the last issue of the New York Sunday Democrat, a Catholic paper, says: "We have good grounds for believing that Mr. Blaine was restored to membership in the Catholic church before he died. The visit of Cardinal Gibbons to Mr. Blaine's house during his illness, and the fact that Father Sherman, S. J., appears satisfied with the spiritual condition of his distinguished relative, seem conclusively that the wanderer returned." Editor Michael Walsh of that paper also prints a letter from Ellen E. Sherman to himself touching Mr. Blaine's religious feelings. It is in part as follows: "You are right about my cousin, Mr. Blaine. He was baptized a Catholic and was a good practical member of the church until he entered a non-Catholic college. Like others he became indifferent and fell away from the faith of his sainted Irish mother. His marriage with a non-Catholic lady, and, I suppose, his ambition, led him to attend the Presbyterian church at Augusta, Me. He is a strayed sheep, and at heart a very good man. I have every hope he will die in the faith." Mr. Walsh said to a reporter: "I believe Mr. Blaine died a Catholic, and I believe that all his life his heart was with the Catholic church. That he had returned to the church is manifest from the fact that Cardinal Gibbons was summoned to his house during his last illness. Such a call means something. A priest at such times is not called from motives of friendship alone." Mr. Walsh said he had known the Blaine family for many years, and from private information his belief that Mr. Blaine died a Catholic had been strengthened so that he had no doubt about it.

DUST-PROOF GOLD-PLATED CASE.

American Lever Movement, Patent Escapement and Regulator, Patent Winding and Setting Attachment Requiring no Key, 240 Beats to Minute; Hour, Minute, and Second Hands.

THE CHEAPEST GENUINE AMERICAN WATCH EVER SOLD.
TIMED, TESTED, AND REGULATED. EVERY WATCH GUARANTEED.

The case is strong and tight, of solid composition metal used the world over as a substitute for Gold, with an elegant Gold-Plated Chain. Packed in a neat box and mailed to any address for $1.50 each; 3 for $4.00 by Express; One Dozen for $15.00 by Express.

FULLY GUARANTEED TO KEEP ACCURATE TIME.

It is fully as durable as the most expensive watch, and with fair usage will keep good time for Ten Years. This watch is being manufactured in lots of 100,000 at the rate of 1,000 per Day by the largest watch manufacturing concern in the world. This constitutes the sole reason for its low price. It is a practical illustration of what may be done in this country by machinery and skilled operators when an article can be sold in large quantities. Its parts are not made by hand by "Pauper European labor" as are most of the cheap watches now sold, which never run long and can never be repaired. Automatic machinery does everything on this watch and every part is as true as a die can make it. The movement is the same as in all American watches and is readily understood and repaired by any jeweler.

Every Watch Timed, Tested, and Regulated before leaving our hands, and carefully packed with chain.

The Existence of a God.

We will answer the remaining points in Mr. Anderson's letter asserting the existence of a God.

Mr. Anderson says, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 7th:

"You speak of tracing things to natural laws. Does it never strike you as being absurd to speak of there being a law without design?"

We are at a loss how to interpret this remark, except on the supposition that our friend misunderstands the word "law." We will, at any rate, reply to it on the line of that supposition, for we know not how to treat it otherwise; and at all events the misconception of the term natural law is common, and a correction of it will come in usefully in the cases of many into whose hands this paper will fall. One meaning of the word "law" is: The command of a superior to an inferior; a rule or order of conduct established by authority; an edict of a ruler or government; an expressed regulation; a decree. Here law involves the idea of personality. But in the phrase "law of nature" the word law has a meaning totally different. It here means the order in which natural facts occur. A law of nature is an unvarying order, method, condition, or relation in which things happen. For instance, it is a law of nature that "Every particle of matter attracts every other particle of matter with a force proportional directly to its mass and indirectly to the square of the distance." For another instance we may take the law of fluid pressure: "At any point in a fluid at rest, the pressure is equal in all directions." That is, these facts are connected in order of existence, so that when we find one of them, we shall always find the other. The confounding of these two meanings of the word law—viz., human command, and order of occurrence—is not at all uncommon. For the word in its latter sense George Henry Lewes in his philosophic writings attempted to substitute a term which should not be liable to this confusion of signification. In his "Problems of Life and Mind" he says:

"By one of the illusions into which Philosophy easily glides, a Law of Nature is supposed to hold a position with respect to natural objects which is analogous to that held by a legislative enactment with respect to social life. Laws are a kind of wise police keeping Nature in order. How far the connotations of Language inevitably transfer this conception of the regulation of conduct to the regulation of Nature, it may be difficult to say; but the fact is that, having once named Process by the word Law, we have great difficulty in keeping the two conceptions distinct. Even careful writers are apt to express themselves ambiguously on this point. . . . Strongly impressed with the mischievous tendency of its suggestions, I was many years ago led to propose the abandonment of the word Law in relation to physical phenomena; but I soon found that the reform was impracticable; the word is too deeply rooted."

Natural law is simply order, or uniformity. The fact that we find everything pervaded by the quality of order or uniformity does not evidence a God. If we find anything at all, it must possess some quality. The quality of order or uniformity has no more weight as Theistic evidence than the quality of—say, relation, or quantity, or generality, or particularity, or number, or changeableness, or durability. Here are some syllogisms of exactly equal degrees of logicalness:

Certain things are always attended by certain other things; therefore God.

Certain things are always attended by certain other things; therefore a dog has ten tails.

Certain things are always attended by certain other things; therefore what's yours is mine.

Another conception which our correspondent seems to entertain, is that all the natural causes which scientists industriously point out for everything are but secondary causes passively handled by an intelligent First Cause to the production of the ends which he chooses. This notion is that all the processes of world-formation, of natural selection producing the faculties of living creatures, etc., which we have been naming over, are but the means which a God has employed, and not sufficient causatives in themselves. Our correspondent's words are:

"Evolution surely does not controvert the idea of a superintending intelligence, but is only a plan of creation instead of a discussion concerning an author. . . . What you overlook is the underlying cause of all things—not the proximate causes, which often a mere child could comprehend."

Our correspondent seems to us to have an inexact idea of what cause is. We think that he would do well to examine the notion of cause until it has become to his view perfectly clear and accurately defined. The cause of an event is not superior to an event itself in any such quality as occult power or mysteriousness. It is as simple and natural as the effect. Its only bearing on the effect is that of order in time. When it occurs, the effect occurs. A cause of a given event is: Some other event, which happening, the given event happens; and which failing, the given event fails. It is: The entire aggregate of conditions, of whatsoever nature, which being present, the given event follows. When we have observed a particular event always following a certain other event, or aggregate of conditions, we for convenience desire some term to designate the earlier event or conditions, and choose the word cause. The relation between the two is nothing more than that (here we suppress some trifling qualifications) of succession in time. It is supposed by many that there is involved something more than this—some interior power by which the one event has brought about the other, and which we should try to discover. But modern positive science has abandoned the notion of such a power or quality, and occupies itself solely with ascertaining the order in which events occur. Now, when we find the existence of the world preceded by certain natural conditions, we are to pronounce these natural conditions the cause, the competent and sufficing cause; search for any mystic or supernatural influence by which they are enabled to produce the succeeding events is fruitless and unmeaning; and here we are to rest—except that when we wish we may look on these causes as being themselves effects of other causes, like them in being perfectly natural, and seek for the causes of them.

The fact that discoveries have so far extended only a certain distance back, can, we should say, be no more used to prove the existence of a God than it can to prove the existence of anything at all else. We fail to see how this fact tends in the slightest degree to indicate the existence of a supreme Soul or Intelligence. It seems to us no more sequent to say:

We have as yet explored only so far back: therefore a manlike being—

Than to say:

We have as yet explored only so far back: therefore all was created by a beast with seven heads,

Or than to say:

We have as yet explored only so far back: therefore the owl and the pussy-cat went to sea in a beautiful pea-green boat.

There is, however, something that we may legitimately infer from the result of our tracing back the course of cause and effect. As we have found only natural causes as far as we have gone, we may infer that we shall find only natural causes as far as we shall ever go. We have so far found for every event (except, of course, those events admitted by both sides to be caused by men or other animals) a cause which is not an intelligence like the human, so we generalize, as we have a right to do, and lay down the law: All events (with the exception noted) have causes which are not intelligences like the human. The Theists, however, absurdly turn this about till they have got it just the opposite of what it was, saying: We have so far found for every event a cause which is not an intelligence like the human: hence, all events have causes which are intelligences like the human. How would these Theists like this kind of reasoning carried out in anything else?—for a taste:

We have so far in every case found it disadvantageous to throw our pocketbook away in the street: hence in all future cases we shall find it advantageous to throw our pocketbook away in the street.

Or—

We have so far in every case found flour, yeast, water, and heat combined to produce bread: hence in all future cases we shall find them to produce ladies' and gentlemen's wearing apparel.

As to an intelligent first cause, which our correspondent affirms by the names of "author" and "underlying cause," it seems to us that there can be no such thing. For science, proceeding upon experience, has felt justified in laying down the axiom, Every event that had a beginning had a cause. Now, the consciousness or nature of God could not have been the same after he had conceived the design of creating a universe, or begun to act upon it, that it was before he had conceived that design, or begun to act upon it; this change in him must have had a beginning at some particular time; hence it must have had a cause; hence God is subject to cause; hence he is not a first cause.

Here is as good a place as any to note the tendency of Theists to consider as a god, and erect into a hallowed and worshipable eminence, whatever natural principle scientists have at the time being found to be the cause of a great number of phenomena. As just at present science has rendered force about the most prominent and talked-about thing, we find Theists ascribing that attribute to their god in preference to the quality of spirituality which was formerly their favorite. Now they more often talk of an Ultimate Force, as a First Cause, than of a Universal Soul. Gravitation, too, since the wide generalizations of science have discovered that principle to be the cause of so very many phenomena, is becoming popular in the distinguished role of God. A clergyman the other day declared in his pulpit, "Gravitation is God!" If, as seems to us, our correspondent is bound, willy-nilly and hob or nob, to call some natural principle or other by the joy-giving name of God, and adore it, we should think that he may as well try this of Gravitation as any other. Gravitation is about as far as we have got. It is a wide-swaying power. Just what would be the articles of faith and ceremonies of a sect started for the worship of Gravitation, we cannot at once say. However, the process of becoming godlike as much as possible, we should conjecture, would in this religion consist in growing to exercise all the gravitation possible, i. e., increasing in girth and jolly plumpness. To the extent of doing our best to fulfill this requirement of godliness, we are willing, if any such sect be founded, to be counted a disciple.

Lately, our correspondent seems to be verging toward Pantheism, the doctrine that everything is God. We hardly know what to say to this. In books written against this notion the argument most common is that directed against what the writers call the absurdity of supposing that a Supreme Being would be pleased to go through all the disorderly and convulsive processes of this earth's generation finally to reach his highest level in so faulty and self-antagonistic a race as ours. We may leave it to everyone to look into this matter for himself—to gaze out upon the doings of the world around him and try what fortune he may have in fitting them to his conception of a divinity. He may, as we will now, turn to the newspapers at his side and see how the latest ongoings of the race or the world appear viewed in this light. Here in one journal, for instance, we find God catching himself in a trap. In the form of a grocer, God had often missed goods from his store. Reflecting, with the sagacity which we have often heard attributed to him by his admirers, that the loss proceeded from nightly thefts, he one evening set a huge trap by his counter so that the floor when trodden would give way and precipitate the intruder into the trap's jaws. The Lord was, it turned out, correct in suspecting himself of the roguery. For when he entered the store next morning he found himself securely caught in the trap. On another page of the journal we learn of his having, in the form of the late comet, scared himself, in the shape of some Carolina negroes, pretty nearly to death. All matter may, as Mr. Anderson supposes (THE TRUTH SEEKER, February 4th, page 75), be intelligent, but surely he ought to admit that it cannot be very much so. The next incident which we come across is that of God being found by a policeman trying to get into a wagon standing in the street to sleep overnight. This was on a bitter cold night, when the tramp, in whose form the Creator was engaged in this transaction, would infallibly have been frozen. Before leaving this incident it is our duty to add that the tramp was prevented from accomplishing his aim, so that our readers' feelings may be set at rest and not left under the disquieting apprehension that God is dead. A corner of the paper which we have been scrutinizing is occupied by an account of God in the shape of a cat watching for himself under the character of a mouse. Merely remarking—for in the latter form the deity had been gnawing some book-covers very annoyingly—that we hope God will succeed in meeting himself, we will bring this article to a close.

In another issue we shall speak to the one point yet remaining out of those offered against us by Mr. Anderson. This is: We expressed a belief that the writings of Darwin, Spencer, Haeckel, Bain, Mill, and Büchner would lead him to "find a call for a designer no longer." He replied that it was unreasonable to expect that these writings should so affect him, and that the authors were not Atheists themselves. We will then show why we made the above-named supposition, and what was the belief of those men.

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers" ($3.00). By D. M. Bennett.

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to have at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselves of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

Acknowledgments.

We gratefully acknowledge the receipt of the following sums presented to us to push ahead the work of Freethought: E. B. Foote, Jr., $5; M. E. Atwood, $1; Mrs. M. A. Jerome, $50; N. C. Creede, $4; Edward Butler, $1. This is the second time Mr. Creede has done this thing to us recently, and Dr. Foote is doing it several times a year to somebody. These amounts are exceedingly useful, for there is always some one willing to distribute Liberal papers but too poor to pay the necessary expense, and such we supply liberally. In this way many people in many localities are reached who otherwise would never know the light of reason.

Colonel Ingersoll on Abraham Lincoln.

Colonel Ingersoll will lecture at the Broadway Theater, Broadway and Forty-first street, on Sunday evening, February 12th. He will talk about Abraham Lincoln, and all who have heard Mr. Ingersoll speak of this great president know that a great occasion is before them. We advise an early purchase of tickets to avoid the speculators.

We hate to mention it again, but we sadly need the money due us from subscribers whose time has expired. We want it badly, and we want it right off in order to pay bills long past due. These bills were incurred in furnishing the paper to these negligent readers, and they will only show a fair spirit in remitting at once. Friends, do not force us to again ask for this. It is but a small sum to you individually and none is so poor that he cannot pay it, but the aggregate is a large sum to us and just what we want to make us square with the world.

The St. James Gazette has been chasing Salvation Army Booth up, and finds that he has used the money obtained from his cheap converts to speculate in stocks. On one transaction it is reported that he lost over $10,000.

The Christian Statesman, organ of the extreme fanatics who are trying to take this nation back to Puritan times, calls our World's Fair leaflet a "devil tract." It is a devilish good tract, and that is what hurts our Christian enemy.

A Massachusetts minister allowed his little daughter to die of typhoid-pneumonia because the Lord did not interfere to save her, and three girls contracted pneumonia recently by being baptized in a river covered several inches deep with ice, and still the Christians want laws against unbelief!

It is rumored that the Rev. Mr. Parkhurst's spying society has secured the services, as chief detective, of "Capt." Wishart, the Pittsburgh fanatic who asked the police to arrest the Freethinkers assembled in that city in a Secular Union congress some three or four years ago. "Capt." Wishart will find his path a little rougher in this city than in the Blue-law state of Pennsylvania. New Yorkers are not very good Sunday-keepers.

Because the Berkeley, Cal., Advocate printed two columns of reading matter written by a Unitarian clergyman the evangelicals of the town have boycotted the paper. The boycott was begun by the Presbyterian preacher of the place, who was followed by all the other supposedly less bigoted pulpites. The Calvinist pastor says he believes Unitarianism to be a great error, and he cannot even subscribe for a paper which allows its doctrines to be stated in its columns.

The newspapers of Pennsylvania are asking for the enactment of a law legalizing the manufacture and sale of Sunday editions of their journals. They are very selfish in the matter, including no other profession or trade in their bill, and we certainly hope the attempt will fail, for the newspapers are the hope of the people in the matter of repealing all religious legislation, and human nature is so selfish that unless his own prerogatives are curtailed the average secular editor won't fight very hard for liberty. Abolish Sunday newspapers in Pennsylvania and the statute of 1784 would have to go.

The Cleveland World thinks Mr. Moody's statement that the steamer Spree was saved only by an act of "divine providence" is remarkable, but that nevertheless it is quite probable that the captain of the steamer that rescued it and towed it into port will put in a claim for salvage. And other unkind people are recalling to Mr. Moody's somewhat imperfect memory the case of his old friend and co-worker, Mr. Bliss, who was killed in the terrible Ashtabula disaster a few years ago, although presumably he prayed as fervently as those who were on the Spree. "Even a man as gifted in prayer as D. L. Moody," adds the Boston Transcript, "should give the larger laws of the ruler of the universe a little more humble praise, and the efficacy of evangelical praying a little less." We would like to get up a match between Mr. Moody and a steam derrick to see which could move a mountain the quicker—he by prayer or the derrick by shovelfuls.

It is pleasant to read the following summary of the beneficent labors of a certain noble body of men: "These men are engaged in almost every branch of scientific investigation and exploration. They are botanizing from Labrador to Lower California. Some are scaling the glaciers of Alaska; some surveying canals in Central America, and some seeking the north pole across the table-lands of Greenland; some are triangulating the continent and some are sounding the deep seas; some are studying the germs of diseases, fighting pests and contagion in man and beast and plant; some are taking substances to pieces and finding the ultimate elements, and others are constructing huge ships and forts; some digging into the earth to find what the ages have deposited, others in Texas are sending explosives into the heavens because, alas! there is no rain in the land." This is what was said of the scientists of America in an address at the latest meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

The Ohio Democrat makes some pertinent remarks which the Sabbatarian fanatics will not like: "Every once in a while," it says, "something transpires in history which throws the antagonistic forces of the church and saloon together as effectually as though their interests were identical. This fact of history has occurred twice in Ohio within our own recollection. The first was when the formation and adoption of the Constitution of 1851 was under consideration, both forces uniting to defeat the reenactment of the 'Tavern License Clause of the Constitution of 1802.' The next instance is that in reference to the closing the World's Columbian Exhibition on Sunday. That the churches are in favor of such closing the ministers, very generally, openly proclaim, and in this they are joined by the liquor-dealers, Sunday theaters, and dive-keepers of the 'Windy City,' who have swung into line the like elements of all the states. That this is true of Ohio is shown by the record. According to the Porter census of 1890, Ohio has a population of 3,672,316, but the petition presented from this state to Congress praying for Sunday closing contains 4,053,426 signatures, as shown by the tally-sheets in Secretary Dickinson's office, or 381,108 more than the total number of inhabitants. Excluding from account the number of church-members who do not favor the Sunday-closing scheme, and the infants who have no opinion, it is fair to presume that more than half a million of the names appearing on the petitions are forgeries."

We have in press for Dr. Hartmann of this city a book which contains enough scientific information to disabuse at least some human minds of the God idea. Dr. Hartmann attempts to show that God is the creation of his so-called creatures instead of their creator. He dissects man as a watchmaker takes apart a timepiece, and puts him on exhibition for himself. The Christian explanation of things is fully considered, and the creation part of the Bible receives a thorough overhauling. The book is illustrated with a diagram showing where our intellectual faculties lie, another making plain the theological retrogression of the era, and a map of the country wherein the Garden of Eden is supposed to have been, as well as where the deluge is alleged to have overwhelmed the world. The book makes over four hundred pages, and the price will be fifty cents in paper and one dollar in cloth binding.

News and Notes.

Industrial Hall was ornamented in beautiful fashion in honor of the Author-Hero of the Revolution. The star-spangled banner was wreathed about the walls and over the platform. In the center of the stage was the portrait of Thomas Paine in a frame of red, white, and blue. A large audience gathered both afternoon and evening and music flowed and speech was uttered; and the martyr of the past became the prophet of the future, whose life was expressed in the motto which glittered in the central arch, "The world is my country, to do good is my religion." The address of the afternoon was given by Mr. Atchison, in which the career of Thomas Paine as the author of "Common Sense," of "The Crisis," of "The Rights of Man," and of "The Age of Reason" was pictured in glowing and enthusiastic language, and not only was Thomas Paine the reformer and brilliant writer celebrated, but also Thomas Paine the inventor, who first suggested the use of steam for ocean navigation and was the designer and builder of the first iron arched bridge by which to-day the highway of civilization spans the sweeping river. The contributions of Thomas Paine to human progress are simply incalculable in their effect. The address of the evening was made by Samuel P. Putnam, who delineated the crowning work of Thomas Paine in the field of Bible criticism where to-day the battle rages so fiercely, and where the banner of "The Age of Reason" is upheld by every advanced Christian scholar. It was in vindication of a just conception of God and the true worth of the Bible that "The Age of Reason" was written, and it has marked out the lines of the scientific and historic study of the Bible, which at present is triumphant in the church itself. "The Age of Reason" is an epoch-making book, a living book to-day, and for all time, a book unanswered and unanswerable. In modern thought is witnessed the glory of Thomas Paine. In the words Liberty, Science, and Humanity are found the spirit and the meaning of his career who fought for Liberty, who consecrated his days and nights to science, who suffered and gave his all for humanity's sake. His idea of God was not that of a mere mechanic God outside of the universe, but the spirit of man's moral nature itself and entirely harmonious with it, for, says Thomas Paine, "any system of religion that shocks the mind of a little child is for that very reason a false religion."

Industrial Hall was packed to its utmost capacity on this auspicious occasion, and was marked by a new departure in the work of Friendship Liberal League, which in times past has done so much to keep alive in Philadelphia the patriotic and Liberal spirit of Paine and Franklin, which to-day is stronger than ever, and looks with hope to larger enterprises. It has $300 ahead in the treasury and is thus on a solid basis. Next year Friendship Liberal League expects to meet in its own hall. A joint stock company is being organized and over one thousand shares were subscribed for at this anniversary meeting. This is a splendid undertaking, and the torch of reason will flame in the Quaker City as bravely as it burnt in the breast of Thomas Paine, whose soul now "goes marching on" victorious over the dark and bloody superstitions of the past. Friendship Liberal League will make a new landmark in human progress.

I see that Dr. Westbrook does not like the logic of his position, and will not accept his welcome into the orthodox ranks, and accuses me of bigotry and intolerance because I have placed him where he belongs as a matter of justice. It is a question of definition—that is all. Is Liberalism a well-defined political philosophy or not? Does it mean anything and everything? Is it a conglomeration of ideas and sentiments, or is it a consistent, firm, uncompromising mental and moral attitude concerning the great questions of human life? I claim it is the latter. It is a grand, harmonious, and constructive system of human advancement. It is not a mere batch of opinions, but a body of opinions coördinated into a living whole. Dr. Westbrook replies to my criticisms by quoting his most advanced opinions in regard to the Bible, the origin of the Sabbath, taxation of church property, etc. But these opinions are held by many an orthodox scholar. Rigid Sabbatharians maintain that the Sabbath is a universal institution and did not originate with Moses. Indeed, the position of Dr. Westbrook is the modern stronghold of religious legislation concerning Sabbath observance. The New York Independent, an orthodox journal, is in favor of church taxation, and so are some of the most creed-bound churches in the country. John Calvin was more Liberal as to Sunday observance than Dr. Westbrook. I don't deny that Dr. Westbrook holds some Liberal opinions equally with Luther, Wesley, Dr. Briggs, and other great lights of the church. I do not deny that he is a thinker, a scholar, and a gentleman. I do not accuse him of hypocrisy. I have not attacked his character in the least. I have declared that he is not a Liberal, and if he held the same opinions when president of the American Secular Union that he holds to-day, then he was not a Liberal when in that office, and the sad failure of his administration is explained by this fact. Why mince the matter? Dr. Westbrook knows that he wouldn't have received a vote in the Secular Union if he had published his address on the Sabbath question before he was elected president. His address was not read before the last Congress because it was in such direct violation of all the principles of Secularism. I challenge Dr. Westbrook to find a single Liberal in this land who will indorse his argument. Let him advertise in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, etc., and see what kind of a response he will get.

What is the deepest question of all to-day between Liberalism and orthodoxy? It is the question of human rights. Liberalism stands for human rights absolutely, orthodoxy does not. Orthodoxy would employ force for the advancement of its claims. This has been the curse of orthodoxy through all the ages. This has made bloody the path of human history; this has made the dungeon, the cross, the fagot; this has slain millions of the human race. Orthodoxy has drawn the sword and compelled men to accept its dictates.

Now, as to the employment of physical force for the advantage of a certain set of opinions Dr. Westbrook is entirely orthodox. He is the foe of human liberty. He is with the tyrant. The gates of the World's Fair are closed by act of Congress—that is, by physical force, for as Washington says, "The state is not persuasion, but force." Dr. Westbrook does not appeal to reason and rely on reason, but he depends on brute power, and he rejoices because he has brute power on his side and can use it. That is what constitutes his damnable orthodoxy. He is at heart a despot, and stands side by side with all the infamous and cruel persecutions of the past and of to-day. If Dr. Westbrook had simply argued for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday and used only reason in support of his position I should not have declared him illiberal, but he is in favor of the use of brute force to sustain his position, and for that reason I put the tyrant's brand upon him. Dr. Westbrook indorses, justifies, and exults in an unjust, arbitrary, and unconstitutional act of Congress, one of the most detestable acts of tyranny in human history. That makes him orthodox and the foe of every Liberal man and woman in the country. Who can doubt this? It is as plain as that two and two make four. If Dr. Westbrook had confined himself to the expression of his opinion and let his opinion stand for what it is worth, all right; he might still be a Liberal in the magnanimity of his spirit, but when he joins the infernal brood of bigots and unites with them in violating the Constitution, invading human rights, trampling upon personal liberty, and using the club and compelling millions of people to stay away from the World's Fair, then I say he is orthodox. He is against the Liberal movement on a most vital point. The attitude of Dr. Westbrook justifies the persecution of every heretic in human history. Dr. Westbrook is in favor of chains and slavery. Let him escape this syllogism if he can:

1. He who is in favor of the unjust, arbitrary, unconstitutional act of Congress closing the World's Fair on Sunday is not a Liberal;

2. Dr. Westbrook is in favor of said act of Congress;

2. Therefore, Dr. Westbrook is not a Liberal.

Is there any flaw in that reasoning? Answer fairly, Dr. Westbrook. Stand by your colors now. On whose side is the bigotry and intolerance? Who is it that kindles the fires of persecution?

Let us see. To-day eleven Seventh Day Adventists are on trial in the criminal court of Henry county, Tenn., charged with violating the law of Tennessee by working on Sunday. These are honest men—good citizens. They have committed no crime. They have simply labored for the benefit of their families. Yet the laws of the state of Tennessee will send them to the chain-gang. The circular of the National Liberty Association, which was headed "The Chain-Gang for Conscience Sake," concludes as follows:

July 18th, in the year of our Lord 1892, witnessed a sight that revives the memories of religious persecution of the Dark Ages. At Paris, Tenn., four Christian men had been lying in jail since June 3, 1892, for the crime of following their common vocations on Sunday by working on the farm plowing, hoeing, etc. The term of one having expired, the other three, after lying in jail forty-four days, were Monday, July 18th, marched through the streets in company with some colored criminals and put to work shoveling on the common highway. All three were men of family, one fifty-five, another sixty-two years of age.

In free America, beneath our flag, the horrible persecutions of savage times are repeated, and every one of these persecutions is justified by the logic of Dr. Westbrook. The same hand that closes the World's Fair on Sunday sends the Christian to the chain-gang. Perhaps Dr. Westbrook does not understand the terrific nature of his argument, but such it is. Dr. Westbrook is in favor of Sunday laws, not on religious grounds but physiological grounds. Throw out religion, then, and take physiology. Is the tyranny any the less? According to Dr. Westbrook labor should be forbidden on Sunday—that is, for physiological reasons idleness is enforced on Sunday. Suppose Dr. Westbrook makes his law. Law is not advice; it is compulsion. But the Seventh Day Adventist rests on Saturday. Therefore he wants to work on Sunday. But Dr. Westbrook says no, physiology forbids; and thus Dr. Westbrook robs the Adventist of fifty-two working days. Isn't that tyranny? But suppose the Seventh Day Adventist won't submit to the tyranny, and works on Sunday. What then? Under Dr. Westbrook's law—physiological law, not religious—the Adventist is arrested, fined, imprisoned, and sent to the chain-gang. Is it not plain to be seen that Dr. Westbrook is enacting the role of a despot? Do we not have the same tyranny, injustice, wrong, and horror under "physiology" as under "religion?" In both cases liberty is stabbed, rights are destroyed, conscience is invaded. I challenge Dr. Westbrook to meet this issue. It is a question of universal principle. Let us understand it thoroughly. I am opposed to tyranny of every kind—to any invasion of individual rights. On no grounds whatsoever are any laws to be made to enforce idleness on any day or any hour of the week. It is the unalienable right of every man to work whenever he wants to work.

Science and Progress.

Repenting at Leisure.

The official organ of the Mexican church party is preaching a crusade against President Diaz, and predicts that he will come to an evil end, unless he should hasten to make his peace with the clergy and obtain their pardon for his numerous and grievous acts of hostility. The president's reply is apt to be a paraphrase of a remark credited to Gen. Bob Toombs, when his Georgia friends urged him to petition the government for a removal of his civil disabilities: "Ask their pardon? Why, God damn their cheek, do they know that I have not yet begun to pardon them?"

A Linguistic Problem.

His holiness, the pope, employs a secretary for the special purpose of collecting international press comments, relating to the affairs of the Vatican, but it appears that the translator is in the habit of modifying the offensiveness of disrespectful remarks, and when a French paper called the holy father "the Arch-enemy of Reason," his reporters metamorphosed it into an "Opponent of Rationalism." It might be worth knowing how they will translate Dr. McGlynn's "Poor Old Bag of Bones."

Sensitiv Despots.

A correspondent of the Volks Zeitung states that whenever the family of the czar review their troops at Czarko Zelo, the Hebrew soldiers are confined to their barracks, under the pretext that "it would hurt the czar's tender feelings to see the enemies of Christ." It seems much more probable that the czar himself is afraid to get his tender feelings hurt by a rifle-ball some of these days.

The Alias God.

Among the students of comparative mythology it is beginning to get a pretty open secret that "Jesus the son of Mary," is merely an alias of Buddha the son of Maya. Their biographies agree in forty-three points that cannot be explained away by sophisms about "concurrence of religious sentiment"—the less so, since most of these parallels have no analog in any other of the numberless religions of the world. They cannot both have lived the same life, and since Buddhism antedates Christianity by at least five hundred years the conclusion seems inevitable that the "New" Testament is only a modification of the Buddha legend, slightly purged of its crass pessimism and adapted to the national traditions of the Hebrew nation. Of a historical Christ and his twelve apostles there is less positive evidence than of a historical King Arthur and his twelve giant-slaying paladins, while the sacred scriptures of Buddhism agree that the Nepalese savior appointed a dozen home-missionaries, one of them a "rock of the faith," another a bosom-friend, a third a traitor who tries to ruin his master and meets a disgraceful death. Buddhism had been gradually working westward since the time of Alexander the Great (who witnessed the self-cremation of the ascetic Calanos on the palace-square of Persepolis), and it is a suggestive fact that some fifty years before the alleged appearance of Christ the Buddhist missionaries reached the border cities of Grecian Asia—a region then swarming with merchants from the coastlands of the Mediterranean. The "local color" of the Christ-myth was probably added in the course of the two centuries intervening between the advent of a Hebrew-Buddhist apostle and the publication of the synoptic gospels in anything like their present form.

Faith-Cure Privileges.

The arguments of the Faith-Cure party practically amount to a plea for the privilege of suicide—a personal right eloquently, and even passionately, urged by many pagan philosophers. Pliny thought the lot of mortals happier than that of the gods, "because man has the power of ending sorrow by flight to the tomb;" and Cicero exhausts his eloquence in lauding the voluntary death of Cato. "To death alone is it due," says Seneca, "that life is not an intolerable burden, that, erect beneath the frowns of fortune, I can preserve my mind unshaken and master of itself. As I choose the ship in which I will sail, and the house I will inhabit, so I will choose the death by which I will leave life." The exponents of Christian Science might argue, with Epicurus, that "a man's life is his most undoubted possession and therefore indisputably at his own disposition," but the question remains if a man has a similar right over the life of his wife or the life of his child. Unless the Faith-Cure fanatics propose to reestablish the paternal absolutism of ancient Rome they should therefore at least avoid to enforce the practice of their theory upon their relatives.

Candid John.

The witchcraft delusion implies a quintessence of absurdity that made its defense a favorite topic of the monkish controversialists, and John Wesley plainly tells his disciples that "to give up witchcraft is to give up the Bible." The frankness of that admission is rivaled only by the reply of Martin Luther, when Zwingli reduced the insanity of "transubstantiation" to mathematical evidence: "From a secular point of view you may be right, but you forget that theology has nothing to do with logic."

A Memorable Publication.

A Washington weekly collects a "symposium" of press comments upon the Chicago Sabbath question, and the Smithsonian Institute ought to frame a copy of that journal for the benefit of the twentieth century. Without the evidence of numerous witnesses the chroniclers of the next centennial might find it difficult to credit that outrage upon common sense and civil rights.

Christian Consistency.

Orthodox writers try to question the existence of the Therapeutæ (a monkish sect of ancient Egypt) on the ground that the treatise De Vita Contemplativa may have been falsely ascribed to the authorship of Philo, and that the strange ascetic habits of those "Christians before Christ" are not mentioned by any other classic historian—as if the chroniclers of the Roman empire could have found time to record the customs of every one of the wretched little subdivisions of Buddhism wriggling in the superstition-crazed East like maggots in a stale cheese. Yet those same critics pretend to reconcile their faith in the "New Testament" with the fact that not one of the numerous circumstantial and keenly observant classic writers of the first century mentions the stupendous prodigies said to have occurred in a Roman province: The descent of an angel swarm, the birth of a virgin-child, the murder of countless infants, voices from the sky, and the appearance of a God, who cures the lame, the blind, and even the dead, and finally returns visibly to heaven.

A Misnomer.

A religious periodical quotes the instance of the "manful Tyrolese," as a nation that has not deteriorated under the influence of Christian institutions. But is it true that the natives of the Tyrol highlands are "Christians" in anything but the name? They are passionate hunters. Their thrift rivals that of the Scotch peasants, and, so far from encouraging reliance on prayer, they have eliminated tramps and plant bann-waelder (barrier-forests) to checkmate the Lord's penchant for punishing their worldliness by means of avalanches. They positively decline to "hate their father, mother, sister, and brother" for Christ's sake, but are very apt to hate their enemies, so much so, indeed, that between 1807 and 1812 their insurgents killed some twenty thousand Frenchmen and sixty-five hundred Bavarians.

Secular Prophets.

Science works more miracles in a year than faith in a century, and secular authors would seem to have beaten "inspired" writers even at their own game: the art of prophecy. "A time will come," said Seneca (fourteen centuries before Columbus), "when old ocean will relax his fetters and reveal the existence of a vast new continent." "Nec erit terris Ultima Thule," he adds, as if he had even foreseen that the New World would be discovered in the far West. In 1765 Fedor Wernihora, a peasant of the Ukraine, predicted the fate of Poland with all the details of the successive divisions and insurrections; and about the same time the Freethinker Rousseau recorded a still more remarkable augury: "J'ai un presentiment que la Corse va produire un homme qui étonnera le monde—"I have a presentiment that Corsica is about to produce a man who will astonish the world." F. L. OSWALD.

Christianity and Slavery.

The men who advocated liberty were imprisoned, racked, and burnt, so long as the church was strong enough to be merciless. The Rev. Francis Minton, rector of Middlewich, in his recent volume on the struggles of labor, admits that "a few centuries ago slavery was acknowledged throughout Christendom to have the divine sanction. . . . Neither the exact cause nor the precise time of the decline of the belief in the righteousness of slavery can be defined. It was, doubtless, due to a combination of causes, one probably being as indirect as the recognition of the greater economy of free labor. With the decline of the belief, the abolition of slavery took place." The institution of slavery was actually existent in Christian Scotland in the seventeenth century, where the white coal-workers and salt-workers of East Lothian were chattels, as were their negro brethren in the Southern states thirty years since, and "went to those who succeeded to the property of the works, and they could be sold, bartered, or pawned." There is, says J. M. Robertson, "no trace that the Protestant clergy of Scotland ever raised a voice against the slavery which grew up before their eyes. And it was not until 1799, after republican and irreligious France had set the example, that it was legally abolished."—Bradlaugh.

Scheming to Avoid Taxes.

THE MINISTERIAL ALLIANCES OF THE ENTIRE STATE OF WASHINGTON UNITED IN NEFARIOUS SCHEMES TO ROB THE PEOPLE.—THE MAGNIFICENT CHURCHES AND COLLEGES AND ALL THEIR SURROUNDINGS TO BE EXEMPT FROM ALL TAXATION.

The following from the Post-Intelligencer of Sunday, January 22d, tells its own story, and is a more powerful appeal to every Liberal of the state to help sustain the Washington Secular Union in its work, than anything any Liberal could write:

TO FREE CHURCHES FROM TAXES.—PETITION FOR CHANGE OF LAW.—MINISTERIAL ALLIANCE TO ACT.

Rev. Dr. W. P. George, president of the Seattle Ministerial Alliance, has issued the following call:

"The ministers of religion of every denomination are invited to meet at the First Methodist Episcopal church, corner Third and Marion streets, on Monday afternoon next at 2:50 o'clock, to consult with deputations from Tacoma and neighboring cities, to take measures looking to the relief of church property from taxation.

"All persons interested in this matter, both ministers and laymen, are earnestly invited to attend.

"W. P. GEORGE, Pres. Seattle Ministerial Alliance."

The petition now being circulated in this and other communities is as follows:

"To the Honorable the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the legislature of the state of Washington in legislative session now assembled.

"Honored and Honorable Sirs:

"WHEREAS, Subdivision 2 of Section 1,022 of the code of general laws of the state of Washington says that, 'All lands used exclusively for public burying-grounds or cemeteries, all church property used exclusively for public worship, shall be exempt from taxation, to an amount not exceeding $5,000;' and

"WHEREAS, We believe that to tax church edifices, parsonages, and institutions of learning, their necessary grounds and appurtenances, at all, is prejudicial to the interests of society and state for the following reasons:

"First: The aforesaid institutions are a gift from those who desire to benefit the public; are not established nor maintained with a view to private or corporate gain, and if taxed are liable to be sold and diverted to other uses.

"Second: By putting the gift in jeopardy we discourage liberal-minded representatives of our various churches from bestowing their benefactions on many, or any of our institutions in the great state of Washington, and they will build no magnificent churches nor colleges in a state that compels them to pay annually a tax on their gift to the people.

"Third: From the fact that but one other state in the Union taxes the church edifices, the impression produced on the minds of religious people in other states is unfavorable to our new and growing state.

"Fourth: If the present law remains in force no denomination can build and maintain church edifices or college buildings that will be creditable to them without becoming a secular rather than a religious corporation and going into business for revenue."

"Therefore, we the undersigned citizens of the state of Washington, and residents of — county, being over twenty-one years of age, do pray that Subdivision 2 of Section 1,022, be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"All lands used exclusively for public burying-grounds or cemeteries; all church property used exclusively for public worship; parsonages belonging to any religious organization, when used exclusively as the residence of the minister or priest in charge of said religious organization, and institutions of learning; with the necessary grounds, furniture, libraries, and equipments for the said churches, parsonages, and institutions of learning."

The Washington Secular Union instantly prepared and commenced distributing throughout the entire state copies of the following counter-petition, for signatures:

To the Honorable the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the legislature of the state of Washington, in legislative session now assembled.

Honored and Honorable Sirs:

WHEREAS, our present revenue law, entitled: "An act to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes in the state of Washington, enacted at the legislative session of 1891, in Section 5 of said act (being Section 1,022 of the Code of General Laws of the state of Washington) makes special exemption from taxation of church property and church institutions, to wit: Subdivision 2 reads: "All church property used exclusively for public worship to an amount not exceeding five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars."

And in Subdivision 7 of said section: "Hospitals for the care of the sick, whether supported in whole or in part by charity, orphanage and orphan asylums, institutions for the reformation of fallen women, and homes for the aged and infirm." And

WHEREAS, We believe all such exemptions from taxation of church property and church institutions are in violation of justice and equal rights, for the following reasons:

First: Because all such exemptions from taxation are in direct violation alike of the letter and spirit of the constitution of our state, which provides:

"Art. I, Sec. 11.—No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

Second: Churches are corporations other than municipal. Each church consists of a "class of citizens" leagued together on account of belief or adherence to certain religious dogmas.

Our constitution declares: Art. I, Sec. 12: "No law shall be passed granting to any citizen, class of citizens, or corporation—other than municipal—privileges and immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens or corporations."

Third: The aforesaid institutions are not gifts to the public for public use. Owners of church buildings, or those in control of them, will not permit them to be used for public purposes; on the contrary, they will not permit priest or minister of a rival denomination—although believing in the same God, the same savior, and the same Bible—to officiate in their church.

Fourth: Churches and all church institutions are managed in the interests of the denomination to which they belong.

Every church exists for itself, for the gratification of its own members. Self-aggrandizement is the governing ambition of every church. The main desire is to obtain the largest amount of dollars so they can hire better musicians, more talented vocalists, and a more popular and eloquent pulpit declaimer, and thus draw larger attendance, and win more wealthy people as members than their rival churches.

Fifth: People who are attendants or members of churches are no kinder, more moral, or more trustworthy than those who are not.

Examination of prison statistics reveals the utter falsity of the claim that churches are of great benefit to the community, restraining from vice and inculcating morality, for the great majority of the prisoners in our penitentiaries are avowed believers in Christianity, are attached to some denomination, and claim to have been regular attendants at church and Sunday-schools in their youth.

Content, virtue, peace, industry, happiness, do not abound in proportion to the number of churches.

In what city did the erection of a "magnificent church or sectarian college" ever result in decrease of the police force, or render needless the jail, or make marked decrease in poverty and crime?

Sixth: Sectarian hospitals, schools, and so-called charitable institutions are run solely in the interest of the sect or denomination controlling them. They are run for what money there is in them, the same as a butcher shop or any other business.

Even in those rare cases where no pay is demanded it is still a matter of pecuniary advantage, for it proves cheaper thus to gain converts to their faith than to hire evangelists and hold revival meetings to swell their numbers.

It is manifestly unjust that the state should charge upon the whole people the support—even partial—or compel anyone to contribute one cent to any institution restricted in any measure to private or sectarian uses.

Therefore, we, the undersigned citizens of the state of Washington and residents of _____ county, being over twenty-one years of age, do pray that Subdivision 2 of Section 1,022 of the code of general laws of the state of Washington be amended by striking out the words, "All church property used exclusively for public worship to an amount not exceeding five thousand ($5,000) dollars."

And that from Subdivision 7 of said section be stricken out the words: "Hospitals for the care of the sick, whether supported in whole or in part by charity, orphanage and orphan asylums, institutions for the reformation of fallen women, and homes for the aged and infirm."

Appeal to the genuine Liberals for means or help to carry on any real practical work that was needed to advance the cause has never been made in vain.

Times are hard, work and money scarce. "These be the times that try men's souls." From the selfish and the apathetic, any more than from the loud-mouthed Bible-kicker falsely claiming to be Liberal, we ask nothing.

But to the true Liberals of Washington who have not yet joined the Union or aided in its constant arduous work, to you we appeal to join our forces so that you can rejoice with us in the grand victory. Ye who dare to give utterance to your honest convictions. Ye who are ever willing to stand up and be counted on the side of justice, truth, and humanity. Ye who dare to investigate and court investigation, whose lives give evidence of the ennobling influence of the truths and principles of Liberalism. Ye who do good deeds, scorning musty church creeds, who earnestly desire to help shed abroad the light that is enabling honest men and women, tossed on life's tempestuous sea, to avoid the rocks and quicksands of superstition, and anchor in the harbor of truth. Ye who do right from love of honesty. Ye who would rather wear the rags of honesty than strut in the gaudy robes of hypocrisy—to the genuine Liberals, to you, true saviors of men, we appeal for help and means in this emergency.

If you have not received copies of the petition, write at once to C. B. Reynolds, secretary of the Washington Secular Union, 420 North L street, Tacoma, Wash. Send name and post-office address—and if not already a member inclose $1 and request to be enrolled as a member of the Washington Secular Union; the $1 pays six months' dues in advance. If you cannot do this write anyway, and you will receive copies of the petition, and if desired properly addressed envelopes to your senator and representative at Olympia.

Meantime cut out the petition from this paper, paste it on a sheet of writing-paper, and proceed at once to obtain signatures, and use every persuasion to induce all to sign, to write personal letters to their representatives and state senators at Olympia urging them to work and vote for the repeal of all laws exempting church property from taxation.

"Inspired" Song.

DEDICATED TO THE SALVATION ARMY.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday like other days;
Where Liberty reigns the gods don't care
Who works, or sleeps, or prays.

CHORUS.

Open the gates, open the gates,
The pagan gods sleep well;
Open the gates, open the gates,
While the colonel rings the bell.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On the Sabbath like all the rest;
Let the eager crowd go fast or slow
On the days they like the best.

CHORUS.

Let the clergy and Congress heed the law
That governs the Jackson park;
Let the Constitution bring them to tow
And make Christians toe the mark.

CHORUS.

Giv back the money to Uncle Sam
That Congress gave as a bribe
To shut the gate with a pious slam
On Sunday to please God's tribe.

CHORUS.

The bloodiest day in all the week
Is the Christian day of rest,
Set apart by Constantine the meek
For priests to feather their nest.

CHORUS.

Open the gates for the rich and poor.
Let's see what man has wrought
With cunning hand from wood and ore—
The outcome of Freethought.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday for men of brains;
Compare them with the grim nightmare
While the clergy holds the reins.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday for "Japs" and "Laps."
Let all put on their Sunday wear,
From the pope to the Russian "paps."

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday for work or feast;
Let God's elect take special care
Of heathens from the East.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday, stop the dram,
Remove the bait from the pulpit snare,
And see whom God will damn.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday for science' sake;
Let the gods of Olympus get on a "tare"
With Eden's sober snake.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Show
On Sunday for devils from hell;
Let the Salvation Army of Illinois
Shout and blow and swell.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Show
On Sunday for change and air,
And let our pious Congress know
This is no Christian Fair.

CHORUS No. 2.

Open the gates, open the gates,
The gods are all asleep;
Open the gates, open the gates,
Let the people take a peep.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday. For every book
From Moses down to great Voltaire
Let saints and sinners look.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday. Let Heston in,
And Ella E. Gibson's Bible rare
That points out pious sin.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday for Annie Besant;
Let the Goodyear Co. hold family prayer
By the India-rubber plant.

CHORUS.

Open the gates of the World's great Fair
On Sunday for Talmage to fight
The colonel whose wit kills inspired bear
And saves the children of night.

Shall Such Things Continue?

I have just returned from our state prison at Joliet. I went to visit the last and most outrageous in many of its details of the Comstock persecutions.

George Wilson, sent up for two years, is a bright young man, an Agnostic, full of enthusiasm and push. Several years ago he started a Liberal bookstore on a small scale, and by close attention to business he gradually increased his stock of goods, at length becoming a publisher of some importance. His place was quite conspicuous as "The Only Agnostic Publishing House in Chicago." Prominent among his publications were the works of Paine, Ingersoll, Besant, and other noted Liberal writers. Success seemed to crown his efforts and prosperity smiled upon him. But alack! no one is safe from the clutches of the hyena Comstock and his saintly crew except Christian bigots and cowardly Liberals who will bend to him the servile knee, who dare not defend citizens' rights to send through the people's highway, the post-office, whatever they may please to write or print without being "held up" by these assassins, dubbing themselves the anti-vice society, and subjected to indignities that no common highwayman would ever inflict upon his victim. McAfee, Comstock's lieutenant, by the means of a decoy letter, obtained the catalog or printed list of the books Wilson kept on sale, and upon the mailing of this list alone was he indicted, no books having been sent.

Two of the books condemned are listed in our public library, and if any one of these "protectors of the public purity" should, under any assumed name, write to the innocent librarian for a list of books there kept, and if he should send one, he could be imprisoned five years and fined one thousand dollars. Beautiful law, isn't it? The other two are on sale at all of our prominent bookstores. The one most referred to in the trial is a trashy French novel, but compared with some of the classics, such as the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, the holy Bible, and many others, "is as pure as ice."

A MISSIONARY DEPARTING FROM CHINA.

From a recent cartoon in the Pekin Illustrated Weekly.

Now, why was George Wilson selected out of the four hundred booksellers of our city and railroaded through to Joliet, tried, convicted, sentenced, and incarcerated within prison walls in less than forty-eight hours? Anyone with a grain of perception can see at once. Simply because he was publishing and selling literature that antagonized the church, and hence these human vultures, servants of the church and anti-vice society, must serve these masters by destroying as far as possible any and all who dare to oppose them.

Judge Bunn, before whom he was tried—as great a bigot as ever disgraced the judicial bench—showed such feeling and made such rulings as would do honor to the memory of Judge Taney of Dred Scott decision notoriety. During the trial, when a witness was put upon the stand with book in hand and bill therefor just dated, who testified he had purchased the same at the store of Jansen & McClurg, the judge simply replied, "They are not on trial and I am loth to believe they deal in such literature."

I have been holding down my indignation at the request of friends who believed that they could, by bringing the case before Judge Gresham, get from him a capias granted on the ground that the sending of the catalog could not be called sending obscene literature, "too vulgar, obscene, and indecent to be mentioned," as charged in the indictment. Gresham admitted the fact, but would not act, advising them to take the case to Washington, for the reason that if a capias was granted in this case, others would be demanded. Too bad! I am, however, more ashamed of the people who bear and wink at such villainous persecution than of the politicians who wear ermin. And especially am I ashamed of professed Liberals who either are so ignorant as not to perceive that this is the club with which the church intends to beat out the brains of the Liberal movement, by destroying the business, usefulness, even the lives, of those whom they cannot cower into servile silence, or are so weak as not to dare defend the rights upon which all our liberties depend, i. e., the right of free speech and a free press.

Think of intelligent men and women sitting silently submitting to have a set of Christian bigots and conscienceless politicians decide what they may write to a friend even, and opening their letters in transit to ascertain what they have written, as is being done, what books they may put upon the market, what pictures they may have in their homes. Oh, the shame of it, that we are such a race of slaves!

What can we do? Agitate the subject. Many citizens do not know of these infamous proceedings. Awaken a public sentiment against it. Write what we please and print it, and send it through the mails to whom we will at any and all costs. Do this till every intelligent, honest, liberty-loving man and woman is in prison, if it come to that. Better a thousandfold have a free mind and wear the convict's stripes, than to be a slave outside, cringing before such corrupt laws and conscienceless decisions. Demand in thunder tones the repeal of all laws such as these, that, if continued, will soon destroy all the liberty that was once our country's boast. Cease to regard law as superior to individual rights, a fetish to be worshiped, and see to it that all laws are made to serve humanity by protecting instead of restricting individual liberty.

Chicago.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

Mr. Alexander Enlightens Mr. Leubuscher.

The question whether or not the brain is the organ of the mind demands first a definition. People very often controvert each other when they are really in agreement, because they attach different meanings to the terms they use. A wind-mill such as they use in Holland, adapted to be driven by the wind, may be called the organ of the wind. Out West a fanning-mill which is used to produce wind is also called a wind-mill. But the latter cannot be called an organ of the wind in the sense the former is. What I mean by the epigrammatic proposition on page 646 is that the brain is not an organ driven by the mind but an organ driven by the environment for the purpose or rather with the effect of producing mind.

The brain does not constitute mind, but its motions do.

This is expanded on page 1001, where it is affirmed that the mind ceases the moment the brain comes to an absolute rest.

Also see page 936. The new-born infant is absolutely destitute of ideas, perceptions, and sensations, consequently it has no mind, but it is a delicately adjusted machine which has been built up by its antenatal environment—the uterus of the mother, and her vascular and nervous organization, which in turn were surrounded by the external world of sights, sounds, pressures, tastes, etc., the influences of all of which were conveyed to the embryo and entered into its formation.

So that the embryo was under the control of its environment from the moment of its conception. And if you choose to go back further, the elements which preceded it were under like control. After the youngster is born the first thing it does is to squawk. That is the way we express it, but in reality it is the motion of the air (a force in the environment) that acting on the lungs stimulates them drives air through the windpipe and squawks it, just as a boy blows through a whistle and whistles it. The first mental act performed by the infant is suction. It is as mechanical as a squawk, but is more complicated. The contact of the nipple with the lips produces a nervous current to the medulla oblongata, from whence a return current is sent back to the muscles in the lips causing their contraction. This is reflex action, the lowest form of mentality. The further and higher forms constituting thought I think I have thoroughly proved are equally mechanical and equally the product of the environmental energies. Hence I call the brain—and all the rest of the body for that matter—the organ of the environment. There is a common idea that there is a mind having an existence of its own and that the brain is an organ used and driven by this mind. It is this idea that I try to refute. An epigram may be entirely true, and yet need some explanation. If a man has a clock destitute of a mainspring he can substitute the pressure of his fingers on the machinery and can run the clock thus as long as his patience endures. But if there is a spring in it, all he has to do is to wind it up and go about his business. We then say the spring runs the clock. And so if a man gets up this morning and goes about the performance of something he resolved on three weeks ago, it looks as if his mind were operating him, and we are apt to lose sight of the energies that have wound him up, that is, given rise to the motion called the mind.

A portion of the brain is used by the mind after it is forced in another portion, as I have pointed out on pages 982, 983, and 987, but as the mind itself does not exist till formed through the brain, it only uses a small part of the brain—as a cant-hook turns over a log—that is, merely as an intermediate instrument.

The Dynamic theory is purely mechanical. The causes are all mechanical—the energy of moving matter. When the theory is tried by the law of the conservation of energy it will be found to account for everything. Whenever we retreat into the fog and mysticism of metaphysics it means merely that some form of energy we are in pursuit of has become so delicate and refined as to elude our observation, as latent heat used to get away from the old philosophers, and as consciousness gets away from the modern ones (see chapter on Consciousness).

JAMES B. ALEXANDER.

Report of the Fourth Annual Convention of Oregon State Secular Union.

Wednesday, January 11th, at 10 A.M. the Oregon State Secular Union convened at the Salem Opera House, President J. Henry Schroeder in the chair, and adjourned to meet at 2 P.M.

Upon reassembling President Schroeder addressed the convention. At the close of the address he called on Katie Kehm Smith to deliver the opening address. Mrs. Smith responded briefly. J. R. Charlesworth, secretary of the Freethought Federation of America, followed with general remarks on the cause of Freethought. C. B. Reynolds, secretary of the Washington State Secular Union, reviewed some of the work done by the Union and made pertinent suggestions on organization.

On motion C. B. Reynolds, of Tacoma; Judge D. W. Smith, of Oregon City, and J. W. Beaty, of Chemawa, were appointed by the president a committee on order of business and recommendations for the good of the organization. On motion the president was added to this committee. Short speeches were made by Messrs. Reynolds, Charlesworth, Hyland, Smith, and others. Committee on resolutions: Katie Kehm Smith, C. B. Reynolds, and J. R. Charlesworth.

Mr. Charlesworth announced to the convention receipt of letters from S. P. Putnam, president of the Freethought Federation of America, who was then in Washington, D. C., in the interest of the repeal of the World's Fair Sunday-closing clause, and stated further that Mr. Putnam was meeting with difficulties in his efforts to obtain a hearing before Congress in a committee, whereupon on motion a resolution was unanimously adopted, copies of which were sent to Mr. Putnam and to the chairman of said committee. No copy of the resolution was kept, but the substance of it was that the Oregon State Secular Union indorse Mr. Putnam's work, appoints him its representative before the World's Fair committee, and asks said committee to give him a hearing. A letter from Hon. C. Beal, the father of Liberalism in Oregon and the ex-president of the Oregon State Secular Union, was read by President Schroeder. The convention adjourned to meet the following day at 10 A.M., at which time the president promptly called the convention to order.

A report of the committee on order of business was adopted, reports of officers called for, report of president adopted, and reports of Secretary D. C. Stewart, Forest Grove, and Treasurer Reuben Wright, Molalla, referred for examination to the committee consisting of Messrs. Hyland and Beaty and Katie Kehm Smith. The committee on order of business, etc., recommended that the Oregon State Secular Union be incorporated. The greatest interest was manifested in this recommendation, and on motion to adopt discussion followed as to the advisability of such a step. Several wished to know what benefits, if any, would be derived thereby. Judge Smith, being called upon, explained the benefits. He was followed by Messrs. Charlesworth, Hyland, Reynolds, and others, who strongly favored incorporation. The substance of the arguments in favor of incorporation was: It gave the Union a legal existence, made it something tangible; everything it did was under authority of law and had the law to sustain it. It was especially important in order that the Union could own and receive bequests; as a legal body it could appoint lecturers and with great propriety ask the legislature to give these lecturers every privilege now accorded preachers. Its lecturers, being regularly commissioned by an incorporated body, could go before the Liberals of the state with a guarantee of their fitness, could hold its officers to more strict accountability, and various other cogent reasons were advanced. The motion to adopt being put was unanimously carried. On motion the president appointed Messrs. Smith, Sears, and Charlesworth as a committee to draft and report articles of incorporation. To this committee Messrs. Forstner and Reynolds were added, the same committee to draft by-laws. They adjourned to 2 P.M., when the convention was addressed by J. R. Charlesworth on "The Philosophy of Freethought."

At the evening session Elder W. W. Sharp, of the Adventist church, delivered an address on "The Evils of Sunday Legislation," which was followed by a short address by J. R. Charlesworth. The business meeting was held after this address, when the committee on resolutions submitted its report and the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, The legislative assembly of the state of Oregon having passed a resolution favoring the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday, and

WHEREAS, We, the members of the Oregon State Secular Union, believing that the Sunday opening of the Fair will tend to increase morality, to better the educational interests of the whole country, and assist in the better success and prosperity of the Fair, therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the said members of the Oregon State Secular Union, in convention assembled, do hereby approve of and indorse the action aforesaid of the Oregon state legislature, and the secretary shall notify them to that effect.

Resolved, That the Oregon State Secular Union heartily favors and recommends the holding of an international convention of Freethinkers at Chicago, Ill., during the World's Fair.

Resolved, That we demand the amendment of the marriage law of the state of Oregon so that it shall authorize any Liberal lecturer commissioned by the Oregon State Secular Union as such to solemnize marriages as priests and preachers are now by law authorized to do.

Resolved, That we demand the abrogation of all laws exempting church property from taxation, and we respectfully urge the state legislature to take immediate action and repeal all such laws whereby church property is exempt from taxation.

Convention adjourned.

January 13th, the convention was called to order at 10 A.M. The committee on articles of incorporation reported the following, which were adopted, one article at a time:

Know all men by these presents, That we, J. Henry Schroeder, president; D. C. Stewart, secretary; B. F. Hyland and J. K. Art. V. The location of said Oregon State Secular Union shall be at Salem in Marion county, state of Oregon, but sessions may be convened and held anywhere in the state under regulations which the by-laws may prescribe.

Committee on by-laws reported by-laws, which after discussion and amendments were adopted.

The officers consist of president, four vice-presidents, secretary, and treasurer, and these constitute the only standing committee, which is the executive committee. Any person in sympathy with the objects may become a member; dues were placed at $2 per annum, payable semi-annually in advance, for gentlemen members; optional with ladies to pay any dues; annual sessions at time and place appointed by executive committee; meeting must be advertised three weeks in three Liberal papers prior to meeting; all persons entitled to vote at annual convention must have been members of Oregon State Secular Union three months prior to such convention.

Adjourned to meet at 2 p.m., when Katie Kehm Smith addressed the Union and friends on "Woman and the Church." After address, auditing committee reported that the reports of secretary and treasurer had been examined and found correct, whereupon the report was adopted. A motion to proceed to the election of officers was carried.

Messrs. Swaysgood and J. B. Quinn, both of Salem, were appointed tellers. The election resulted as follows: W. W. Jesse, Barlow, president; J. Henry Schroeder, Arago, first vice-president; B. F. Hyland, Corvallis, second vice-president; D. W. Smith, Oregon City, third vice-president; J. K. Sears, McCoy, fourth vice-president; Katie Kehm Smith, Oregon City, secretary; D. C. Stewart, Forest Grove, treasurer. Adjourned.

The evening session was addressed by C. B. Reynolds on "The Nine Demands of Liberalism." Business meeting after address. A system of registering membership was adopted, consisting of a printed page showing names of officers, objects, and that portion of the by-laws pertaining to membership and dues, with blanks for name of person wishing to become a member, to subscribe to the objects. Every person wishing to become a member is required to sign one of these blanks and file it with the secretary, accompanied by dues.

Katie Kehm Smith, having made application, was commissioned a lecturer, under the auspices of the Oregon State Secular Union. A vote of thanks was extended to Messrs. Charlesworth, Schroeder, Smith, Stewart, Reynolds, and K. Kehm Smith for services rendered the convention. Convention adjourned.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

I have never seen a more earnest congregation of Liberal men and women than that assembled at the Salem Opera House. Everyone seemed to realize that something must be done, or the response so often met with, "It's no use paying our money and getting nothing in return," would become universal.

Liberals of Oregon, carefully read the report of the financial condition of the Oregon State Secular Union. What will you do to better that condition? Had it not been for the untiring efforts of the president and secretary, it would have been almost impossible to meet expenses of the convention. The thanks of every Oregon Liberal are due to J. Henry Schroeder and D. C. Stewart.

John R. Charlesworth made a splendid impression on the members of the Oregon State Secular Union. He is an enthusiastic worker; well posted, and is, and will be, a power for good in the Liberal cause.

Mr. B. Forstner and his estimable wife, Louise Forstner, tendered the use of their parlors to the committees and extended the hospitality of their home to visiting members of the Union. The entertainment of these generous friends will long be remembered.

It is our opinion that C. B. Reynolds is doing grand work for the cause in Washington. He is a splendid example of what can be done for Liberalism, when meetings are held at regular times and places.

The executive committee of the Oregon State Secular Union have authorized the printing of letter-heads, in tablets of one hundred sheets each, showing names of officers, objects, and digest of by-laws; the same to be sold to members wishing them at $1 per tablet, the purchaser's business card to be printed thereon if he wishes it.

Those of our members who are not acquainted with our new president may be interested to know that he is a successful merchant of Barlow; is one of those brave Liberals, ever ready to champion his principles; whose integrity is so well known that Christians themselves render the verdict, "His word is better than gold." He has a beautiful home at Barlow; his noble wife, the mother of seven fine Liberals, is "Mamma Jesse" to hundreds of friends who have enjoyed the hospitality of her home. Such a father, such a mother, and such a family are the best monuments Liberalism can build.

Let every Liberal in Oregon, and all others interested, send to the secretary for membership blank, and identify themselves with the Oregon State Secular Union incorporated. Let us hear the verdict of Oregon Liberals on the work of the fourth annual congress of the Oregon State Secular Union. Let us have your opinion, whether favorable or otherwise. There never was a more opportune time for us than now, and let us take advantage of it.

Right here let me call particular attention to the scope of the work contemplated by the new organization. Most important of all, it contemplates the organization of science Sunday-schools throughout the state to take the place of the Christian Sunday-schools, thus providing the retreat which has so long been desired by Liberals for their children, so that they may not feel obliged to attend Christian schools or stay at home. This step alone, it must be conceded, is one of the most important ever taken by a Liberal organization, as it reaches the children. It is our desire to prepare a series of lyceum lessons to be used in our science Sunday-schools and which will be printed in leaflet form.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Secretary Oregon State Secular Union.

Liberal Societies.

Mrs. Imogen Fales delivered an interesting lecture last Sunday at the Brooklyn Philosophical Association. As usual, there was a large and appreciative audience present. The subject was the "Labor Question." Among other things Mrs. Fales said: "The industrial system is no longer in harmony with the needs and tendencies of the age and through unlimited competition fortunes are amassed by the few and the many are becoming poorer and poorer. Not only is there competition among the employers but among the laborers.

This is owing to the fact that the supply of laborers exceeds the demand. Labor organizations are the only barriers against the entire and complete control of monopolies, but the former are handicapped by not having an entire and mutual cooperation, and instead of taking and working contracts themselves, thus gaining all the profit obtainable and controlling their own wages, they allow contractors to undertake the work which they could accomplish without their assistance. Machinery does not help the poor men; it has in reality done them injury, for children are now able to do the work of men, and the person who attends a machine doing ten times as much labor as he previously did without its aid, works the same length of time, showing it is a gain of the employer and not of the laborer."

The critics were Mr. Hanson, Mr. Bellows, Mrs. Sleine, Dr. King, Mr. Snook, Mr. Rowley, and Mr. Elwell. Next Sunday Dr. M. L. Holbrook will lecture on "The Transmission of Acquired Character from Parent to Offspring."

At the meeting of the Liberal Club held Friday evening, February 3d, Mr. J. W. Sullivan lectured on "Direct Legislation."

Mr. Sullivan dwelt at some length on the benefits which Switzerland enjoyed under a system of direct legislation. He said, in this respect we had many things to learn from our sister republic. He said he believed that the tendency of the times was in favor of direct legislation, and that it would ultimately be procured.

The other speakers of the evening were Robert Blissert, W. A. Wilson, Dr. Kinget, Dr. Weeks, and Mr. Prigsley. On February 10th H. C. Lockwood will lecture on "The French Republic;" on February 17th, J. E. Rensburg on "One Hundred Flaws in Christ's Credentials;" on February 24th, Mrs. Imogen C. Fales on "The Labor Question."

Prof. A. B. Severance writes: "The Liberal Club of our city celebrated the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, Sunday evening, January 29th. We first had appropriate music; then a selection was read by Prof. A. B. Severance, taken from a portion of Robert G. Ingersoll's works. Then a patriotic song by the whole audience, that made the hall ring with their melody. Dr. H. S. Hixon opened with a short address, followed by Robert Schilling, ex-Congressman Henry Smith, Colin Campbell, and many others. It proved a grand meeting. All the speeches were good; especially so was Schilling's speech—it was perfectly grand. The German society of Freethinkers had a celebration at the same time at their hall with appropriate exercises."

J. F. Lawrence, of Cincinnati, O., writes: "It is astonishing to note the progress that has been made during the last year in Cincinnati. We now have two strong societies here, both giving public lectures and employing every other honorable means devisable to promulgate Secular principles."

"The Ohio Liberal Society holds forth in Douglas Hall every Sunday night, and the Cincinnati Secular Society gives its public lectures in College Hall. Both societies have a large membership, and are growing rapidly and are financially strong. On the 29th of January three of the most prominent Liberals of this place were to speak in three different halls under the auspices of three different societies: Col. R. G. Ingersoll, at the Grand Opera House; Prof. W. S. Bell, at College Hall; and B. F. Underwood, at Douglas Hall. It was indeed a trying time for Christians."

C. Severance, of Los Angeles, Cal., sends this report: "A successful and satisfactory celebration of Thomas Paine's birthday was held in the Los Angeles Theater January 29th, which is the third time in the history of this church-ridden community that the memory of this great man has been duly honored. Mr. Geo. T. Bruce, the eloquent orator, about to take the Freethought lecture field, delivered the principal address; and the generous applause that greeted his remarks revealed the satisfaction and approval of the fine audience before him. Mr. Bruce has oratorical gifts of a high order, and his advent as a Freethought lecturer gives the cause of mental freedom an able defender and the priesthood a determined foe. He should receive the support of all 'our people' who have the opportunity to hear him, for such speakers are needed to spread the light and continue the work which Paine began. Following on the program came the writer with a short address, and then Mr. Christian Michelsen, a native of Denmark, who paid a high tribute to Paine and his productions. Interspersed with the speaking were fine music, solos, and recitations."

Vigorous Work Against Sunday Tyranny.

LEXINGTON, KY., Jan. 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please express by Adams's as per inclosed check $5 worth of World's Fair Leaflets to distribute in this city.

I hope you will succeed and have a religious exhibit at the World's Fair. If so, let me know and I will remit $25.

Obituary.

CEDAR DALE, ONT., Jan. 16, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to inform you that Mr. Brooks is dead. He died September 21st, after a long and tedious illness, caused by paralysis. He was a veteran of Freethought for many years of his life, and as such died, and was buried, with a Secularist funeral oration, at the ripe age of seventy-seven years.

MRS. S. BROWN.

Praise.

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Jan. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Dear friend of Liberty, find inclosed $1.50 to pay on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have taken several Freethought publications, also had copies of many of the leading journals of Liberalism, but please excuse me, and do not deem it flattery, when I say I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER better adapted to the needs of the masses, and also cheaper, as it furnishes more reading for the price, than any journal that has hitherto fallen into my hands.

HERRISSA MARIE CRYDER.

Eight Beacons Lit in the Gloom.

GOLDEN POND, KY., Jan. 19, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: We have done the best we could to help THE TRUTH SEEKER by sending in eight subscriptions for 1893. We trust that by another year we may be able to increase the number. We find that many are willing to read the paper now but do not like to subscribe. Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER may long come to us, as we are fully in the faith and work of Freethought and trust that when our days are numbered it may be said that we lived as we professed to believe,

Yours truly, BOGARD & RODES.

Let Every City Have a Freethought Disseminator.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Jan. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I usually do missionary work with THE TRUTH SEEKERS not sold, and would take more of them if able. Nothing has ever given me such supreme pleasure as the flaunting of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the face of superstition and bigotry. I do not wish to flatter you, friend Macdonald, but there is no paper, no book, no argument that is so intensely hated and feared by these colossal humbugs the priests as is THE TRUTH SEEKER with its cartoons. And if our rich Liberals could be induced to start some poor devil who has courage and no money in a little news-stand in every city for the sale of Liberal papers and publications, they would be astonished at the result.

A Good Way to Push Freethought.

OAKLAND, CAL., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I wrote to you that I had made a bargain with a newsdealer to keep two TRUTH SEEKERS on his stand and keep them where the pictures could be seen by the public, and keep them for a week; that I would pay him ten cents a copy for all that he did not sell. Well, I have had to buy only two copies, and he told me this morning that he had calls for more than he could supply some weeks. I am not a bit sorry that I made him the proposition, for I cannot get anyone to subscribe for it. I took that method to circulate it, and it has worked well so far.

I should be lost without THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you all a Happy New Year, I remain,

Yours for truth and liberty,
FRANK BUTLER.

The Preachers Show the Immoral Influence of Christianity.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I., Jan. 22, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I see that you intend publishing another edition of "Crimes of Preachers," and ask for newspaper reports re recent crimes of the clergy. I therefore send the Moncton, N. B., Times, in which is an article bearing on the subject. Last summer I began cutting articles of this sort out of the papers, referring to the peccadilloes of the clergy residing within a radius of two hundred miles of this place—for amusement and pastime. And within the course of a couple of months I had a drawer full of clippings of the doings of these followers of the "meek and lowly," and the task of keeping a record of all of them was too much for me, so I destroyed all the records in disgust. The clergy are endeavoring to make it a "hot place" for us Infidels, but it will be hotter for them when you get out the new edition. A. E. McDONALD.

Death Ends All.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Dec. 25, 117.

MR. EDITOR: I send you this little poem I wrote yesterday and set to music, for publication, as it is very appropriate for Secular funerals and may be appreciated by my fellow-Freethinkers. I will have the music published soon. DR. C. W. MAK.

SOON.

Soon the summer's gone,
Soon the flowers die,
Soon the night succeeds the dawn—
So quick the moments fly.

Soon all love will die,
Soon all hearts must break;
Soon this fleeting life will fly,
And room for others make.

Soon the dream is o'er,
Soon our life is past—
Soon we're gone forevermore,
In death to sleep at last.

A Conscientious Preacher.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Jan. 19, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find order for THE TRUTH SEEKER. After preaching Methodism for a term of five years, I came to the conclusion, by studying and reasoning, laying aside prejudice, that what I presented as a fact was only a theory. I met, to my astonishment, in Eureka a body of men who were truth seekers whom I found to be men of principle and reason to such an extent that I was made to say, give us more freedom. Let us throw aside yokes of sectarianism and superstition, and investigate for ourselves. I mention in connection with this article Mr. Stephen Lawmon and Mr. McKensie, whom I found ready to reason fairly, and who carried with such reasonings conviction. Give us more such men. Let the good work roll on. I will in the future lend my aid to the advancement of Freedom. I am,

Sincerely yours in the work,
G. M. THORP, Ex-Methodist preacher.

An Enemy to the Design Theory.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Jan. 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send you some suggestions on the Design theory. My contention is that we must begin square, clear, and plain, and establish its possibility, if not its certainty, before we can properly take one step forward in defense of the theory. Let us settle the premises on a consistent, rational, and indisputable basis, then proceed to the details one way or the other. I have read your editorial. It may be useful and instructive to a large class of casual thinkers and excite them to further inquiry. But I should like your astute friend Mr. Anderson to go back and begin again and start his theory on an impregnable basis, then for one I should be interested in what he might say in keeping close to the point at issue.

I inclose $5 for some delinquent subscribers on the lists I have sent from time to time, for which I have generally paid from my own purse. T. E. LONGSHORE.

A Freethought Paper for Children.

PUEBLO, COL., Jan. 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: That all denominations have literature for their children is an undisputed fact, but the Liberals are entirely too negligent in regard to the minds of the young, the result of which is that they too often fall back into the old ruts of superstition that the parents imagine they are freed from. The children need good mental food, and not a rehash of the pious fables that the fathers and mothers starved on in "the good old times." I hope the young Liberals in every state had the Little Freethinker as one of their holiday presents. If they did not get it then it is not too late yet. Fifty or one hundred families, and as many more as can, should send in their fifty cents to Elmina Drake Slenker, Snowville, Va., then the Little Freethinker would come out in a new dress and we should all feel proud of it.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

A Determined Foe of Sabbath Bigotry.

MILFORD, MASS., Jan. 16, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than ever since you changed it last year. But I have got away behind on reading it, which I do thoroughly or not at all. The reason for this is, I have been very busy for several years past, and then have other papers which must be read at once or never, while your paper cannot grow old—certainly not until the Nine Demands are adopted and put in force easily.

Inclosed find check for $6—$5 of it for THE TRUTH SEEKER two years from date, and $1 for the leaflet demanding opening of the World's Fair on Sundays. Send me only twelve leaflets; I would like to have you distribute the rest—or use the balance in any other way you think best to keep the Fair open.

Last summer I addressed postal-cards to the New England Homestead World's Fair vote, and got several persons to sign for it to be open Sundays. But the vote went over two to one in favor of closing it.

Wishing you a Happy New Year, I remain, Yours respectfully, C. C. FISK.

Some Spiritualists May Reply.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Jan. 7, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please inform me through THE TRUTH SEEKER whether the following story told by some Spiritualists is true? Charles Dickens left at his death a half-finished book. Several years after an uneducated carpenter from Boston (medium) in a trance wrote the remaining part, without having any knowledge of Charles Dickens or his works. And the best and ablest critics shall not have been able to show any break or fault in the work. If that story is true, how will the Materialist explain it?

I have just attended the State Alliance meeting, and among other resolutions, there was one passed favoring the opening of the World's Fair on Sundays. There was some opposition to the resolution, the claim being made that it did not concern the Alliance whether it was open or not. I suppose the antagonists were afraid of showing the public their color. Amongst its advocates I noticed Senators Trobstfield and Steenersen, who showed clearly that it was a deal between the saloon and the church to rob the people. I inclose stamps, for which please send me a few pamphlets containing the three asses—that is, the pictures of the clergyman, the saloon man, and the Fair commissioner.

What All Should Have—A Library.

HOUSTON, TEX., Jan. 18, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I belong to a newly organized workingmen's club by which I was appointed a committee of one to select a small list of books amounting to $10 as a starter to a library for the club's use in discussions and enlightenment. In doing so I have been careful not to select too many of an anti-religious nature, as the average man has a weakness of stomach in this particular respect, but have paid more attention to books of a politico-philosophico-economic nature, as being more suitable to the use of our club till it can stand a stronger dose.

This is only a starter and we intend and expect to make more and larger orders in the future. A great many of these books I could have got here in Houston, but preferred to order through you.

We especially want books of a politico-economic and monetary nature at present. One book, on the abolition of interest, we want, but do not know by whom it is published or the price. If you can replace something on the list which you do not have by this book, please do so. Furthermore, send your catalog and price-list, and greatly oblige. Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Death of an Excellent Man.

PERKINS, CAL., Jan. 19, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Abna Burns died last Saturday, the 14th, about 4 o'clock in the evening, of pneumonia. He was buried at Sacramento on the 17th. He lived about two miles from me for thirty-six years. He was a good Freethinker, and a speaker for the Farmers' Alliance. There were eighty-five carriages at his funeral. Mr. Burns was the first man that ever mentioned the name of Col. R. G. Ingersoll to me. He and I were together at the meeting when Samuel P. Putnam came the first time to Sacramento. After he mentioned Col. R. G. Ingersoll's name he gave me about ten of his pamphlets, which were just what I needed. I shall never forget it. I bought the first $5 volume of S. P. Putnam that I ever saw of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's. Mr. Burns was sixty-two years of age. He was an old friend of Samuel P. Putnam. OWEN T. DAVIES.

Mr. Wettstein Hears About Bible Worships.

LAWRENCE, KAN., Jan. 4, 1893.

OTTO WETTSTEIN, Rochelle, Ill., Dear Brother: I am glad to know that you are sending such a bright light into the world, bright enough to open the eyes of the blind, that they may see their condition.

Now, if I had the means, I would travel and lecture, and try to emancipate and liberate the minds from superstitious ideas. You have expressed my views better than I could. Let me add a few thoughts to what you have already said. Was Noah, after the flood, inspired to plant a vineyard and make wine and get drunk, and curse one of his own sons, and tell him he should be a fugitive and a vagabond, and a servant of servants unto his brothers? I suppose he was, because he was a preacher of righteousness. If he was not inspired, then it is a history of what transpired.

Was Abraham inspired to take his servant-girl and raise up a child by her and then drive her and the child away from home to starve to death in the wilderness?

Were Lot and his two daughters inspired to take wine and go into a cave and drink so much wine that Lot did not know anything? I suppose he died of insanity, as that is the last account it gives of Lot.

Was Aaron the high priest inspired to make the children of Israel a golden calf for them to worship?

Was Moses inspired to order a man to kill his brother and companion and neighbor?

Was Samson inspired to take the jaw-bone of a donkey, the grandfather of a mule, and slay a thousand men with it?

Was David inspired to take Uriah's wife and then put Uriah in front of the battle to get him killed, so as to get his wife?

Now, if all these men were not inspired, it is a history of what transpired.

If you publish any literature, please publish this. If not, please send it to some Liberal paper that will publish it. You know that these words coming from a speaker, mixed in with anecdotes, would sound better than being read.

Any literature you may send me I will distribute, to the best of my judgment, where it will do the most good.

I would like very much to have one of your badges, but do not feel able at present to buy one. I am proud of one thing—there is not a minister here that will meet me in a debate upon the Bible.

ALEXANDER ROSE, F. L. T.

Thinks Spiritualism Like the Old Religions.

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER can find enough to do to keep it busy for the next century seeking for the truth in the claims for Spiritualism as made by A. H. Frank, of Buffalo, N. Y., in his letter headed, "What Spirits Have Done," which was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER December 31st in reply to an article by M. C. Severance which had previously been published in your paper.

More wonderful to me than all the sublime works of nature, even the bound-lessness of time and space, is the blind credulity of some men who claim to be investigators. Reading between the lines of Mr. Frank's article, I should judge him either a willful fabricator or the unconscious dupe of some medium, who, while Mr. Frank is busy constructing machinery, is inventing some new trick with which to victimize him; and I believe the latter to be the fact, for he seems to be honest in his belief, and there are many such apparently intelligent persons ready and willing to believe any absurd story they hear no matter how unphilosophical the proposition may be. How can we convince them? How can we show them that they are but the victims of unscrupulous tricksters, so that they will investigate before accepting any theory no matter how convincing or plausible? How, Dear Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, can we paint the picture of truth in such glaring colors that people will become ashamed to advocate such doctrines as that a medium, a man or a woman, can intercept the laws of nature and perform such phenomena as described by Mr. Frank? Science has long ago driven out of the world even the thought of caprice, and has shown that all things in the universe are governed by an unintermittent and consistent law, and the rational philosopher regards no causes but such as are reducible to this natural law.

It seems that there is nothing so absolutely absurd or ridiculous but it can be accepted or appear reasonable to a mind filled with omens and prognostics. How can you reason with a man who believes that a medium can overcome the laws of gravitation and cause a piano to float in mid-air around a gas-jet, to say nothing about the excellent music the instrument played without the touch of human fingers during its aimless flight, or that minerals, plants, and even live animals can be transported by spirits from one country to another and passed (presto!) through a solid wall in case of the doors and windows being closed, or who still believes in the old slate trick?

The fact is, Spiritualism is but a new form of a supernatural religion which like all other religions grows involuntarily. It feeds on the impossible and incredible as its natural element and cannot live a day on what is true or even possible. It must have something grotesquely absurd as its basis, as only the undemonstrable can be advocated forever.

Science has torn the mask of orthodox miracle and Spiritualistic phenomena from the face of nature and revealed the marvelous features that no skill may interpret; and many popular delusions it is dispelling. The beliefs in gods, ghosts, devils, witches, angels, goblins, spooks, imps, fairies, spirits, etc., etc., are loosening their hold on the imagination of even children. Touched by the finger of science these phantoms vanish like empty vapor. Many are the dreams she is dispelling and many the visions she is dissolving.

J. F. LAWRENCE.

Wonders How Christians Can Believe.

CLEVELAND, O., Jan. 4, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I find in my experience that the prevailing idea among Christians is, that Freethought will license crime and vice of all kinds. Of course the trouble is, they will not think, for if they did they would see the beauty of Freethought. These and the words "truth seeker" they do not analyze; if so, they would see that what we want is the truth. We do not condemn their Bible before sifting it to the very bottom. If it is true we want to know it. If not, we also want to know it. If a man says to me that he has studied his Bible and after reasoning in his own mind finds it is impossible to believe it, my respect for him goes up a number of degrees, for I see in him an intelligent and noble creature—intelligent, from the fact that he reasons for himself, and noble, for if he did not love truth he would not seek after it. The trouble with the shallow-minded Christians is, they look only at the surface, for the Bible draws a thick veil of superstition over their eyes so they cannot see clearly. They go on having blind faith in a myth, for the Bible does not allow them to judge its almighty.

In other words, we must not use our reason, but God makes us, just as we are, reasonable creatures, and then gives us a book to believe and worship that is not reasonable, that contradicts itself, goes against all laws of nature, and for a clear and unprejudiced mind (in my opinion) is impossible to believe. As the boy said, faith is "believing something we couldn't or didn't believe." A lady acquaintance said to me a short time ago that she "believed the Bible," and finally wound up by saying that "it was best to keep on the safe side." Now think for one moment of the justice of God (for "God is just"), when this one will not use her reason for fear her faith will be shaken, but says she believes so as to get a reserved seat in heaven and gets it, while another one who is no hypocrite cannot believe it and says so, and is sentenced to punishment for ever and ever, just for not believing what one cannot. Now, if we are blinded, God is all-powerful and merciful, and can read all hearts, and he loves his people, and with one word could change our hearts and make us believe, guide us as a father would his child. But no, he gave us a book that is not fit for children to read, and we have not heard from him since. My dear friends, how can human beings love such a monster as the Bible pictures him? I say they cannot. It is nothing but fear.

The Christians say we take all hope away from them. I say we do not; we take away their fear. Again, they cite what good Christian people have done. I do not question this, for I have known very good Christian people, but that does not prove their belief to be true by any means. It is not the people but their belief that we despise. Think for one moment what bloodshed, what anguish and despair, that one book has caused in the world. I remember some time ago seeing an illustration in a book called "The Beautiful Story." It was of the flood. There was a rock, and poor helpless human beings were trying to climb up for safety. Some were lying dead. Others were holding their little innocent babes in their arms and vainly trying to lift them on the rock for safety as they were being swept away. Their love was so great for their children that they would perish to save them. Also wild beasts were scrambling up the rock with their young in their mouths, trying to save them. I do not know that I ever had anything strike me so forcibly as that picture did. I sat and looked at it and studied it. And we are to believe that "God is love." Yet he would destroy his people that he created, innocent babes that knew no wrong. It touched my heart to look at it. But my humanity can not be compared with his.

That is not all. His wrath is not appeased. On the judgment day he will raise these poor creatures and send them to hell to be burnt in fire of brimstone. How any intelligent, clear-minded human being can believe such things I am not able to say, for I cannot understand it. I often think what a nice thing it would be to have an invention to take down one's thoughts. When I get to thinking on the "Truth Seeking" question I seem to think a bookful. But it is another thing to take these thoughts out and clothe them properly—to get them down on paper. Our eloquent thoughts are so badly spoiled that we feel too discouraged to make another attempt. But I am a strong advocate of truth.

MARY C. VAN TINE.

A Congressman Who Favors Uniting Church and State.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Jan. 22, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed an article by the Hon. John Davis, member of (our) Fifth Kansas Congressional district, and also my reply to the same. I suggest you publish both.

THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION—SHALL IT BE OPEN ON SUNDAY?

There is much public interest manifested in this subject, and the matter is worthy of earnest consideration. The great majority of the clergy and most of the church-going people say: "Close the gates on Sunday; do not desecrate the Sabbath!" But a very considerable minority are careless on the subject, or say, "Open the gates!"

Then, there is another very large class of people who are entirely careless as to the church view of the Sunday subject. They view Sunday as any other day of the week, and decide at once that the Exposition must be open on Sunday in order to enable laboring people to see it. This class of people who are solicitous for the rights of labor are so numerous, so intelligent, and so earnest, that their opinions must be respected. It is from this point of view that I now write. I claim that the rights of labor and the laboring people must be considered and granted. The men and women of America who have made the great exhibit possible, must be permitted to see it in its very best aspects and to the fullest satisfaction.

But what of the Sunday exhibit? Will the Sunday exhibit be a full and fair one, such as labor should see? In my opinion it will not and cannot be. Many admit that the machinery should cease its motion on Sunday. All admit that states, countries, and individuals should be permitted to close their buildings or to cover their exhibits on Sunday if they choose to do so. All agree that there should be no coercion in this line to compel a Sunday show where states, nations, and individuals desire to respect the Sabbath by closing their buildings or covering their exhibits on Sunday.

In the face of these facts it is plain that the Sunday exhibit will be only an emasculated one. The laboring people who see the Exposition only on Sunday will see a very poor affair. The laboring people should not be satisfied with such an exhibit as can be seen on Sunday, when the very best is done that can be done on that day. Nor will men and women who have worked six days of the past week, and must work six days of the coming week, be in very good condition to see and examine an emasculated, silent, half-open, half-closed, half-dead Sunday Exposition. Working people must rest as well as other people. They have a right to see the Exposition in its very brightest colors, and they have a right to their Sunday rest.

The laboring people of the cities, shops, factories, and mines, also have a right to a weekly half-Saturday holiday. In many places they have been demanding this right. In some instances this half-Saturday holiday has been granted. It should be granted everywhere. Then a very small change during the summer of 1893 will solve the Sunday-closing question. Instead of the half-holiday on every Saturday, let there be granted to all laborers desiring to attend the Exposition a whole-day holiday every alternate week during the months of May, June, July, August, and September, 1893. Let the day of the week for the holiday be arranged to suit the mutual convenience of employers and employed in each particular case; provided that, in case of disagreement, then each alternate Saturday shall be the holiday.

With this arrangement the plea for Sunday opening to accommodate laboring people falls to the ground.

As this plan insures Sunday closing, in my opinion the clergymen and churches of the nation should join their voices with the laboring people in their just and equitable demand for a whole week-day holiday every alternate week.

If the clergy and the churches will join in the demand that the laboring people shall see the Exposition in its brightest glories on week-days, there will be no longer any demand to see an emasculated show on Sunday. The Christian Sabbath will be observed by a complete and sensible closing, giving all a day of rest.

Religion, humanity, and justice all demand that labor shall see the Fair on week-days. The sacredness of the Christian Sabbath and the rights of labor can be maintained by closing the Exposition gates on Sunday, and by giving to labor ample opportunities to see it on week-days. In my opinion, this is the more liberal and the better policy.

JOHN DAVIS.

I must confess that I was laboring under a mistake as to the position the Hon. John Davis occupied in regard to Sunday opening of the World's Fair. I was misled as to his position by the leading People's party papers. They reported him and Senator Peffer opposing the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. It is true they claimed that this was done on account of the appropriation attached, and although I have taken the National Watchman almost from its first issue, and notwithstanding I always scan the headings closely, and would have been very much interested in an article headed as the above, yet I entirely overlooked it, or it was issued as a supplement and one was not inclosed to my address. But the mistake, whether it was made on my part or the publisher's, saved Mr. Davis a vote, because I have very decided opinions on the subject, and knowing that Mr. Davis is a very liberal-minded gentleman, I cannot help but think he is very hypocritical in his remarks. Not that I do not respect Mr. Davis's right to differ with me, but I can respect an opponent without supporting him, and when anyone does support a person that differs with them, they can only do it from the motive either they have more respect for the opinions of their opponents than their own, or they hold so many opinions in common on other subjects that they feel that they can afford to sacrifice this one. But as for me, I exalt this above all other opinions that Mr. Davis and I hold in common. My opinion is that Mr. Davis is establishing a very dangerous precedent in taking the position he does on this subject. He is liable to throw this country back into the Christian Dark Ages and barbarism from which it sprang. He says, "There is another very large and intelligent class whose opinions must be respected." Will Mr. Davis please point out from the beginning to the end of his chapter where he has the least inclination to respect this "very large and intelligent class," except the taffy and very flattering notice he has given us in the above quotation? With that exception, has he not wholly ignored our opinions? Queer way Mr. Davis and his Christian coadjutors have of showing their respect for their opponents by the position that Mr. Davis admits the Christians would take provided they were defeated on the question of Sunday opening. I would like to ask in the name of fairness and justice, of all that is right between man and man, if they did not intend to stand by the decision when they carried the question before the national House of Representatives, where it did not belong, what did they take it there for? But it is just as fair and considerate, and not more so in proportion, as civilization has advanced in spite of them—as their past acts will show. So Mr. Davis takes up on the side that he admits would stand by the decision if it was reversed, instead of virtually saying to such an unjust and unfair-minded people, "Begone with you! I know you not! You are only fit company for John Calvin, Constantine, and Torquemada!"

Whenever a person gives a different plan, as he has done, in polemics, it is called dodging or begging the question. And taking in consideration the cramped conditions of the laborer, as Mr. Davis is willing to admit, it is not holidays that the laborer is suffering for. It is lock-outs and the meager pittance that he gets for his labor that hurts. And it stands laborers in hand to not lose a moment's time that can be used to good advantage. Mr. Davis is very liberal with his holidays for the laborer, but the question is, Can they afford to lose the time, and at the same time spend more than they would have earned in a previous week besides, while the greater portion of them have large families to support, with exceedingly high house-rent to pay? No, I repeat, it is not holidays that the laborer is suffering for. I suggest to the laborer that it is dangerous to "reciprocate" with the church. They will "want the whole hog" the same as they have been striving for, as in the case of the World's Fair, and will go back on you and be your worst enemies if they do not get it.

Mr. Davis talks a good deal about civilization and Christianity, as if they were synonymous terms. I would like to ask him if the Holy Inquisition, the Crusades of the Dark Ages, hanging witches, burning Bruno and imprisoning Galileo, and killing and imprisoning discoverers and inventors even down to the discovery of printing and inventing of the fanning-wheel, had a great deal to do with bringing about civilization. If so, how has it happened that anything approaching anyway near civilization has happened within the last two or three centuries, notwithstanding Christianity has existed for eighteen hundred years? Has not civilization advanced just in proportion as Christianity has lost power?

"Keep church and state forever separate." "This government in no sense is founded on the Christian religion."

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Burial of Summer.

The summer dies with crimson stain,
September pours her azure rain,
Whose purple wine and reddened lees
Make torches of the maple trees.

We welcome glad the gold and red
As once the May that joyous led
The summer's bridal boon and cheer
To fill and round the harvest ear.

We will not pierce through autumn dyes
To find the gray of wintry skies,
But reap our gladness now, to-day,
With crimson leaves that cannot stay.

The poor dead summer, pale and thin,
Sad breezes bear her funeral hymn;
Yet birth has been, so death must be
With evolution's mystery.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Dick.

DEAR FRIENDS IN THE CORNER: May I tell you about my pet lamb Dick and the happy times we had together, and how after all these years I find a certain joy in thinking of him.

It happened in this way: Father kept a large flock of sheep, and one spring Sister Matt and I used to go with him every morning and evening to look after the lambs.

How plainly I remember every part of the road with its three narrow paths and the strips of grass between, looking so much like a striped ribbon, green and gray, out past the watering-trough by the orchard to the bars.

No wonder artists so love to paint them on so many of our Christmas cards and other little souvenirs.

Memory holds for me this charming picture of that old pasture on the side of the hill painted by that best of all artists Nature. There is the rough stone-wall with the pole-fence on top, and the great grim rocks scattered around like so many houses, with paths around them for streets, with here and there a stump, all that now remains of the once noble trees. They fittingly fill the place of the soldiers' monuments we see now in nearly every village. Then comes the wood below for background with its varying shades of green and brown. This was the sugar place, and was the sweetest place of all. Farther down is Bell Water pond looking so much like the blue sky.

This is the way I see it yet. I know for many years the iron horse has rushed along through those quiet fields startling bird and beast with its shrill whistle and ring of progress. But to me it is the same dear place and can never change.

Well, one evening we went down just as the lambs were having their good-night romp; they run and play, chase each other up on to rocks, and jump off, and away they all go again like so many little girls. The old sheep will look up from their feeding and watch them in a thoughtful way, although wondering, perhaps, if they ever could have been so rude and gay.

This evening we found one little wee fellow that did not seem to have any name, so father took him up and brought him to the house and told us we might have him for ours.

I really don't think he ever lacked for love or care after that.

What a dear little pet he was! Such a clean, sweet face, with his dark, intelligent eyes! How fast he grew! We named him Dick—very soon he knew it meant him, and that shows that sheep understand a great deal and learn so easily.

If he was feeding and he heard our voices, no matter where we were, he would come. Perhaps all of you don't know that sheep can go anywhere girls can, over fences, up and down stairs, and all about.

I don't remember that he ever "followed us to school" as Mary's little lamb did, but he went raspberrying once. We had gone off slyly, for he had a habit of thinking every pail or dish held something good for him. We had a pail placed on a rock, and were picking in small dishes; we had nearly filled our pail, when what should we see but Dick standing with his nose in the pail? Not finding anything he liked, he gave it a poke, and over it went like "Phebe's blackberries," but there were plenty more, and we were not picking to sell in order to get nice clothes to wear to church, but to make a shortcake.

I never remember feeling angry with Dick when he did such mischief. Mother did not allow him in the house, but it was fun for us to hear his little feet go patter, patter on the floor, and we were always quite willing to run out with him.

One of the farm buildings was a large hoghouse, the top part finished off to store farming tools, etc.; for stairs there were planks quite wide put up on the outside with cleats nailed on for steps—it made a fine place for us to run up and down. One day we were jumping off here and having great fun when Dick came running to join. He came under the walk just as Matt was jumping off, so she landed astride of his broad, soft back with her face toward his tail. He ran about with his strange load crying, ba-a-rr! ba-a-rrr! till she fell off. We all laughed and clapped our hands till she was so angry she began to cry. Dick came walking up to her looking so sober, and he seemed to say, "Please don't cry, little mate, I feel as sorry as you do."

Be loving and kind to your pets, dear children; study their habits, you can learn so much from them. My New Year's wish to you all is that you will be true and good. Let refinement and morality be your religion and ever keep on the sunny path of Freethought; and that I may meet you somewhere along the road, is the great desire of your friend, Pennacook, N. H.

Correspondence.

MEADONTE, ONT., Jan. 20, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner, and I hope it will not be the last. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER the last three years, and he likes the paper immensely. I am sixteen years of age, but I do not go to school. I have three brothers and one sister, and they all like to read the Children's Corner and look at the pictures and compare them with the Bible. I was down at Orillia Sunday evening to hear Mr. Ellis lecture, but I did not care much about it. There were quite a number of men there, but the women were scarce. I think my letter is long enough for this time, so I will close. I remain,

Your Liberal Friend,
LUCY M. TAYLOR.

PUEBLO, COL., Jan. 17, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have long wanted to write and tell you how much I enjoyed your description of your trip abroad, especially the scenes in Scotland. I seem to see it all with new vision. I always like to read letters of travel from a woman. They see and tell of the details that men ignore or forget. It would be fine if you could publish it in pamphlet form. I am glad to see the renewed interest in the Children's Corner, and new letters from new writers. I read every one and like to know all they are doing in their far-off homes. I hope they will describe the scenery about them, the different varieties of trees, flowers, soil, etc., etc. I am always delighted to read the articles from the pen of Ida Ballou and George Remsburg.

I have been very ill or should have written to you before to tell you how glad I was to see you are re-elected to the school board of Fall River. I notice your name in the Woman's Tribune too. Keep on; you are a power in the land.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

[Thanks for kind and appreciative thoughts. Sorry you have been ill and trust you are much better now, dear friend. The weather has been severe, and hard for everyone.—Ed. C. C.]

ELMO, MO., Jan. 25, 1893.

FRIEND MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I have been a constant reader of the Corner for about one year, and am comparatively young in the Liberal belief, but as I have had experience in the so-called conversion, which I think is nothing more than an excited state of mind, I am as strong a Liberal as if I had been one from my birth up. I am almost the only young Liberal in our town. Most of the people are of some religious belief, and it is not popular to be a Liberal, but I will not be a hypocrite. That which I believe I am always willing to express openly and above-board. Some of my acquaintances say to me, "I would be afraid to doubt there being a God." It seems to me as if they were living in the dark ages of superstition. When they say "You must believe or be persecuted" I often think if the money that is expended for religious purposes was contributed to the school funds we would have a much more enlightened class of people. For illustration I will take our own town: we have here three churches, which if they were converted into one building would make a good college building, and taking the salary of each minister at $500 a year (which is small), would make a total of $1,500 a year, which would pay the salary of a good instructor, which, I think, would be more beneficial to the rising generation than an hour devoted to the worship of an unseen being every Sunday. We have had this winter about six months of school and about eight months of revival meeting. Which is the more elevating to mankind? I would like to correspond with some of the Corner readers. I am,

Your Liberal friend,
J. E. KRAFT.

[The above is a very sensible letter, and friend Kraft is a sensible young man. If churches could be converted into colleges, or schools of science, hygiene, and philosophy, everyone could become well educated, and we should not then have the standing disgrace of a penitentiary in every state in the Union, and a vast array of paupers and imbecils to support.—Ed. C. C.]

ELCELSIOR, WASH., Jan. 20, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I want to tell you, and all the little friends of the Corner, of my experience with a Christian lady, one of the regular blue kind. She wanted a little girl to work for her. I went to see her about it, and found her in the back yard with two fine chickens that she said she was going to send to her minister. I thought first, I would go right home, but afterward I thought I would stay and talk with her.

She said that she wanted me to stay and help her, that her work was not hard. After getting my wages down by saying that I would have a great part of the time to myself, she kept me at work every minute, from 6 in the morning till 9 at night, and then she engaged two boarders. I told her that I could not stay if she was going to keep a boarding-house. She said, "You will have to stay, or I won't pay you for what you have done." That afternoon her minister and wife came and stayed to tea. The minister talked badly about Mr. Ingersoll—he called him "old Bob Ingersoll" and "old Bob." I was indignant and wanted to tell him that Mr. Ingersoll knew more and was a better man than all the preachers in the world. I went to church with them Sunday evening, and she got up and cried in church and said she was a great sinner. I thought she told the truth then, if she did lie about her work. I went home and she did not pay me. I hope there will none of you have to work for a Christian. From your Liberal friend,

BLANCHE L. REITER.

[Blanche did well to go away from that employer. Always stand for your principles and do right.—Ed. C. C.]

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE Reynolds Blasphemy Trial, At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

News of the Week.

On the night of the 23d ult., at Denver, Col., a crowd of five hundred persons gathered at Dean Hart's house and stoned it. Their anger had been provoked by the dean's continued instigation of raids on Sunday theatricals. Patrol wagons were driven through and over the crowd, clubs freely used, and revolvers drawn. The police had difficulty in protecting themselves, and were unable to make an arrest.

A LETTER from Rome expressing the views of many prelates there, and in every country, reads: "The audacity with which Monsignor Satolli rehabilitated Dr. McGlynn fell like a bombshell in this camp. To permit Dr. McGlynn to act again as a priest without his going through the form of saying 'Pater peccavi' to the archbishop of New York shows not only utter lack of tact on the part of the papal delegate, but it also sanctions a breach of discipline unheard of in the history of Rome."

At Pittsburgh, Pa., the Law and Order League is pleased with the decision just given by the supreme court confirming the legality of the Blue law of 1794 which that society has revived for the purpose of suppressing Sunday newspapers. The law prohibits the following of worldly pursuits on Sunday, except those that are absolutely necessary. The decision of the court was in conviction of Mr. Matthews for publishing the Pittsburgh Sunday Leader. The Law and Order society will now complain to magistrates against every Sunday's work done by carriers of or dealers in newspapers.

The annexation of the kingdom of Hawaii, or the establishment of a protectorate over it, is being considered by our government. European powers may challenge our rights, and interfere. The kingdom of Hawaii consists of fifteen islands in the North Pacific ocean, of which only eight are inhabited. They are 2,100 miles from San Francisco. They have an area of 6,640 square miles. The population consists of 34,436 negro natives, 15,301 Chinese, 12,360 Japanese, 8,602 Portuguese, 1,928 Americans, and 1,344 British—total 80,000. Nine-tenths of the trade is with the United States. Hawaii's importance to us would be as a maritime defense.

In England pietists proposed a society for the suppression of profanity. Presently they found that a law punishing it already existed. It was passed in the time of George II., and for a profane oath uttered by a laborer imposed a fine of one shilling; for one uttered by a person above the degree of laborer and below that of gentleman, two shillings, and for one by a gentleman or upward, five shillings. The action is culpable if committed in one's own house, the same as on the street. The first case punished under this revival of the law was a few days ago, when a laborer at Wisbeach named Abraham Pye was fined for four profane words one shilling each, and thirteen shillings costs.

A NEGRO ravished a four-year-old girl at Paris, Tex., and then murdered her by tearing her in two. The entire population of the surrounding country, numbering thousands, turned out and assisted in burning him at the stake. The relatives of the girl burnt his feet with red-hot irons and finally put out his eyes with them. As he struggled out of the fire several times he was thrust back. No such scene has been witnessed since the religious tortures. Of the many opinions expressed for and against, perhaps the most sensible is the one that it was well enough so far as the negro was concerned, but not well concerning the torturers, who by such cruelties are molded to commit a dozen more crimes of a violence equal to the negro's.

GEO. RUDOLPH, an ex-priest, was delivering an anti-Catholic lecture at Lafayette, Ind., on the night of the 26th ult., before an audience of three thousand in the Opera House, when a Catholic mob broke in the stage doors and began shooting at him. He drew a revolver and fired back. Members of the American Protestant Association came to his aid and the firing became general. The audience was seized with panic, and men and women were knocked down and trampled in flight. All but determined members of each sect presently got out. It was learned that Rudolph had been hit in the hand. He attempted to resume the lecture, but was prevented by a shower of rotten eggs from the gallery, and forced to retire, amid hoots and hisses. This was repeated several times. Sheriff Gaddis and deputies arrived just in time to prevent the Catholics, who had now formed in full strength, and under desperate leaders, from overwhelming the ex-priest and his guard. Rudolph was got into a cab and driven off at a speed that outdistanced his enemies.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utility of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
 Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
 In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
 In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
 In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stipendiature; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
 Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
 Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin.
 In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.
 In paper, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

"SUCH is the destiny of great men; their superior genius always exposes them to the venomous darts of calumny and envy.—Letter of Frederick the Great to Voltaire.

A FRIEND is one who incessantly pays us the compliment of expecting from us all the virtues, and who can appreciate them in us. It takes two to speak the truth,—one to speak, and another to hear.—Thoreau.

TRANQUILLITY or peace of mind, which is also called wisdom, is a thing so desirable that its value is beyond all estimate. Possessing it we wonder at nothing, we fear nothing, and we enjoy everything, for when we know how properly to frame our manners, order our actions, and moderate our desires, we are continually happy.—Democritus.

So far as principles were concerned Voltaire was the greatest lawyer of his time. I do not mean that he knew the terms and decisions, but that he clearly perceived not only what the law should be, but the application and administration. He understood the philosophy of evidence, the difference between suspicion and proof, between belief and knowledge, and he did more to reform the laws of the kingdom and the abuses at courts than all the lawyers and statesmen of his time.—Ingersoll.

If you wish depth, genius, imagination, taste, reason, sensibility, philosophy, elevation, originality, nature, intellect, fancy, rectitude, facility, flexibility, precision, art, abundance, variety, fertility, warmth, magic, charm, grace, force, an eagle sweep of vision, vast understanding, instruction rich, tone excellent, urbanity, suavity, delicacy, correctness, purity, cleanness, eloquence, harmony, brilliancy, rapidity, gaiety, pathos, sublimity and universality, perfection indeed, behold Voltaire.—Goethe.

LORD BACON knew not Nature, but he knew and pointed out all the paths that lead to a knowledge of her. He despised, early in his career, that which fools in square caps taught under the name of philosophy, in those madhouses called colleges; and he did all that he could to keep them from continuing to confuse the mind by all those words which not only ignorance rendered respectable, but which a ridiculous blending with religion rendered sacred. He is the father of experimental philosophy.—Voltaire.

A FRENCH student who now begins the study of the law buys for three francs a copy of the "Code Civil," a volume about as large as a pocket Testament, and as easy to understand as the Ten Commandments. Napoleon may have caught the idea of reducing French law to this simple form from a sentence in one of Voltaire's letters in 1739. "What disgusted me with the profession of advocate," he wrote, "was the profusion of useless things with which they wished to load my brain. To THE POINT is my device."—Parton's Life of Voltaire.

Would it then be just to conclude, with Christendom, that the career of Jesus presents phenomena wholly unique in the world's history? Such is, perhaps, the natural impulse of the human mind, after contemplating a life of heroic self-abnegation and devotion to the welfare of human kind. With a like thought, we have doubtless risen from the perusal of the noble tribute to the founder of another of the world's greatest religions in Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia." We are touched in a similar manner by the contemplation of the noblest characters of fiction—the Jean Valjeans and the Romolas, ideal exemplars of this religion of lofty self-sacrifice. But sober second thought should lead us to question whether we ought not rather to bear in mind the human limitations of even the noblest of those who have lived and died for man, lest we fall into a species of idolatry and hero-worship inconsistent with the mandates of rational religion. At least let us not exalt one unduly by the disparagement of all others. Old Father Taylor, of Boston, the seamen's missionary, whose abundant humanity outweighed the depressing implications of his creed, when he was asked, "Do you think there ever was as good a man as Jesus?" instantly replied, "Yes, millions of them!" Have not you and I also known hearts as true and souls as full of manly courage? Let us not deny Jesus his proper place in the world's history, nor place him so far above the level of our common manhood that he shall fail to be to us always a rational example and inspiration to all noble things. Let him live in our hearts and minds as a heroic, manly character, "not too saintly to be human."—Lewis James.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A Growing Danger.

Advance sheets of the Catholic directory report a growth of that church at once gratifying to the pope and dangerous to the country. At the head of the list of officials is Satolli, the "apostolic delegate," or pope's henchman. Then comes Cardinal Gibbons. The archbishops number 14; the bishops, 73; the priests, 9,338; the seminarians, 2,575; the churches, 8,431; the chapels and stations, 3,920; the seminaries, 33; the colleges, 117; the academies, 644; the parochial schools, 3,585; the pupils in the parochial schools, 731,385; the charitable institutions, 647; and the total Roman Catholic population is reported at 8,632,521.

It is a bad showing, if correct. Every Romanist is at heart an enemy of republican institutions. The church officials are despots, greedy of power and money, and willing to use both in the most unscrupulous manner to further their purposes. Already they have the two chief cities of the country in their political grasp, the public schools in many places are under their control, and a large portion of the property is held by them tax-free and useless to the community. Politically they are working quietly, though surely, but boldly as to the schools. It is their desire to turn the public into what would be practically parochial schools, and to do this they use every means of bargain and compromise that the cases respectively call for. In Baltimore a circular embodying the views of Archbishop Ireland on the school question has been quietly circulated in the last week among the priests, Catholic members of the city council, and officials of the municipal government. The circular suggests the following legislation: "1. If the city and state would affiliate our schools to the public schools, placing the secular education under the superintendent of the same. 2. By renting our schools at a nominal price, which would exempt the state from a considerable expense. 3. That our teachers be Catholic. 4. That we grant to the commissioners of the public schools the right to examine our teachers and also the right to examine the pupils, to know if their progress in secular education be satisfactory. 5. That we would claim all the rights and privileges of the public schools for the support of our schools. These are all the conditions the state requires, and hence we demand all the rights and privileges of the public schools. It would add immensely to their usefulness." Several priests of that city have expressed themselves as favorable to the submission of such a proposition to city councils, providing Cardinal Gibbons indorsed it.

This plan carried out would be nothing more or less than a presentation of Baltimore's educational facilities to the Roman church. It would be an outrage upon every non-Catholic in the city, and the fact that the church is bold enough to propose the scheme is evidence that it is not unlikely to be perfected. Rome makes few political mistakes, and scarcely ever openly extends her hand for a plum that is beyond her reach. Her single thought is to perpetuate and extend her power. For this she intrigues politically and socially, in and out of season, and allows no opportunity to escape her. By forming the minds of children she captures the coming generation, and Catholic politicians and parents are her most submissive slaves. It is for these reasons that her growth is dangerous, and that the figures in the new directory should cause alarm to all who love liberty.

Justice Done in at Least One Instance.

The Rev. Parkhurst's chief spy has been convicted of blackmailing a keeper of a disreputable house, and now inhabits a cell in the city prison. There seemed to the jury to be no doubt of his guilt, and probably there is not, whatever one may think of the motives of the police who "made a case" against him.

This Gardner is not the only "agent" of a private society who ought to be in jail. There are two other societies in this town which interfere in the public business and whose agents are charged with acquiring wealth through corrupt dealings. In fact two "detectives" employed by one of them are now in limbo, we believe. And the chief "agent" of the other ought to have been long ago deprived of his liberty to injure others. From Parkhurst masquerading as a "Western gent" witnessing indecent orgies to the boy carrying the smutbags of such fellows as the John street soapboiler employs, the whole lot are the outcome of a vicious principle engrafted on our system of criminal jurisprudence, and naturally induce and commit more crime than they prevent. What Sidney Smith said of the English prototypes of these kind of moral scavengers is as true now as then: "It is hardly possible that a society for the suppression of vice can ever be kept within the bounds of good sense and moderation. If there are many members who have really become so from a feeling of duty, there will necessarily be some who enter the society to hide a bad character and others whose object it is to recommend themselves to their betters by a sedulous and bustling inquisition into the immoralities of the public. The loudest and noisiest suppressors will always carry it against the more prudent part of the community; the most violent will be considered as the most moral, and those who see the absurdity will, from the fear of being thought to encourage vice, be reluctant to oppose it. . . . Beginning with the best intentions in the world, such societies must in all probability degenerate into a receptacle for every species of tittle-tattle, impertinence, and malice. Men whose trade is rat-catching, love to catch rats; the bug-destroyer seizes on his bug with delight; and the suppressor is gratified by finding his vice. The last soon becomes a mere tradesman like the others; none of them moralize or lament that their respective evils should exist in the world. The public feeling is swallowed up in the pursuit of a daily occupation, and in the display of technical skill. . . . An informer, whether paid by the week, like the agents of this society, or by the crime, as in common cases, is in general a man of very indifferent character. So much fraud and deception are necessary for carrying on his trade—it is so odious to his fellow-subjects—that no man of respectability will ever undertake it. It is evidently impossible to make such a character otherwise than odious. A man who receives weekly pay for prying into the transgressions of mankind, and bringing them to consequent punishment, will always be hated by mankind, and the office must fall to the lot of some man of desperate fortunes and ambiguous character. If it be lawful for respectable men to combine for the purpose of turning informers, it is lawful for the lowest and most despicable race of informers to do the same thing; and then it is quite clear that every species of wickedness and extortion will be the consequence."

The opinion current in this city regarding these fellows is that they punish when they cannot blackmail. That on small salaries many of them accumulate considerable property seems to bear out this more than whispered suspicion. Personally, they are of the classes they follow, and if seeking congenial companions or amusement would go to the saloons and dives, unless, as some do, they "work the religious racket" and pose as models of morality when in reality they are the grossest of hypocrites.

A bill has been introduced in the legislature of the state to make inducers of crime equally guilty with the one committing it. It ought to pass into law, and another law ought to pass into force abolishing all private societies of the kind presided over by Parkhurst and Gerry and the soapboiler of John street. Our constitutional officers are quite capable of coping with all the crime committed, or if not they can be removed and capable ones substituted. There is no earthly need for the Society for the Prevention of Crime, or Cruelty to Children, or Suppression of Vice. All that they do that is well can be done better by the regular officials, and their wretched agents would then be deprived of their power to use the machinery of law to punish those who will not pay.

The World Grows Better As It Grows Impious.

Because religion is declining, the clergy say that the world is growing worse. This is egregiously false. In every respect, mental and moral and physical, mankind is improving.

For instance, the annual report of the Toynbee Hall Settlement, in the East End of London, for 1892, says that there has been improvement in the housing of the poor and in the order of the streets, a distinct rise in the rate of wages, baths and libraries have become more numerous, and altogether the standard of living is higher.

George du Maurier, the English artist, is authority for the statement that women are growing taller, broader, and generally healthier. This pleasing change is ascribed to physical culture, and it is being prophesied that in time women will become the physical equals of men.

The use of wine at dinner, remarks Chauncey Depew, has been decreasing for several years. In novels and autobiographies of fifty and one hundred years ago "one-bottle," "two-bottle," and "three-bottle" men formed a feature of the description of the society of the period. They did not take light wines either, but solid sherries, ports, and Madeiras. We learn that it was common at these entertainments for a number of the guests to be hopelessly intoxicated. The fact that the diner-out was apt to get in this condition did not impair his popularity or his standing among his friends. One may dine now every night in the year and never meet with a tipsy person. It is because we drink very much lighter wines, and less of them. Mr. Depew goes on to say: "As matters are now progressing in the social world the next generation will be found dieting under medical directions. They will be enjoying better health, doing a larger amount of work, and enduring a greater social strain in a festive way, and having a better time than their fathers did."

Holy Russia.

Reports from Russia continually direct attention to the baneful results of religion and despotism. The soil of that country is fertile, minerals abound, and all the natural conditions of prosperity are present. But the church has suppressed education, science, and every form of knowledge, in order that people should not question her dogmas; and the government has eradicated all habits of independence and self-improvement, so that its extortionate rule may be perpetuated. The consequences are dreadful.

Count Bobrinsky writes:

"Apart from their need of daily bread, fuel is likewise required by the distressed population. There is a dearth of straw, of coal, and of wood, and the shivering inmates tear down the thatched roofs of their huts or break up their carts and other useful domestic appliances to provide fuel. To crown all, typhus and epidemics among children are appearing. The scene presented on a walk through any part of the district is ghastly in the extreme, heart-rending spectacles meeting one's gaze at every turn—cold, damp huts, with moldy walls, the snow falling through the apertures of the roof (the thatch having been used as fuel), the flooring coated with mud, while on the top of the spacious stove lie huddled together five or six individuals in the paroxysms of typhus fever, unattended, and without even bread and milk, and several months of winter weather still before us."

A correspondent of Selskiya Vedomosti from the province of Viatka gives a description of the manner in which the peasants of his locality plowed their fields last spring and autumn. "In our region," he says, "the ground is turned up with the plow only once in the season, and always with the archaic pickax plow (an implement seen only in Russia). For want of horses the peasants drew the plow themselves by the following contrivance. Between the thills, in the place where the hind legs of the horse are to go, a common cartwheel is fixed to mark the track for the plow and to keep the thills from falling to the ground. In the place where the fore legs of the horse are to go a man is hitched, so that while he helps pulling the plow he holds the ends of the thills with his hands to keep them steady, that they should not dangle sideways. To the hook of the plow, above the ground, a rope is attached, from which four lines with loops are drawn. These are the pulling lines, which the men take over their shoulders. Another peasant walks behind the plow pressing it down in the usual way. Six persons are required to pull the plow, but where the ground is hard one more person is needed to help push it from behind. Men and women together worked at their plows in this manner last spring and autumn."

The organ of the English Jewish committees, Darkest Russia, suspended publication awhile ago on the assurance that, if it ceased, Russia would modify her persecution. Those who knew Russia laughed at this, but the promise came from a quarter which could not well be ignored. Now that oppression has become worse than ever, Darkest Russia will appear again.

A writer in the English Contemporary Review says that the czar persecutes the Jews not because of innate cruelty but through religious zeal. He states: "Those who maintain that the czar is kept in complete or even partial ignorance of the cruel measures adopted in his name, or else that his boasted love of his people is but the varnish of hypocrisy, are as much astray in the matter of fact as in their appreciation. Cold-blooded cruelty or savage hatred is not the correct name of the motives that inspired the slaughter of the Amalekites by Saul, or the Autos-da-fe of Arbues de Epila; and it should not be forgotten that there is a moral ailment called a false conscience, the effect of which is to poison the action without vitiating its source."

"Men never do wrong so thoroughly and cheerfully," says Pascal, "as when they are obeying the prompting of a false principle of conscience."

Russia is an example of true Christianity valuable beyond all theories as an object-lesson. If the people of this country will only study her history and take note of her present condition they would want no union of church and state and no real Christianity. The Greek Catholic church is the older of the two branches, and, while its operations have been confined to eastern Europe, it has wrought its work no less completely than has its Roman sister in the countries she controlled.

Horace Greeley's Sanity Sustained.

The Detroit, Mich., Evening Journal of January 27th printed this:

"Horace Greeley on Thomas Paine."

"Horace Greeley in 1850 was invited to attend a ball and supper in honor of the birthday of the great Infidel. Instead of going, he wrote an editorial in the Tribune, from which we take an extract:

"(Paine's) writings are grossly distasteful to us, not merely nor mainly on account of their infidelity. Skepticism may be and has been so expressed as to win the profound respect of the most devout believer. But when a man places himself in ostentatious hostility to the convictions of the wise and good of fifteen centuries, 'a decent respect for the opinions of mankind' (as the Declaration of Independence phrases it), should teach a man to speak considerately, tenderly, respectfully. But Paine had no such idea. He sat down in the French prison, to which his brother Infidels had most causelessly consigned him, to overthrow the religion of the Bible without a copy of that book at hand—without having ever carefully or dispassionately considered its claims to credence, or the evidence which sustains them—assuming that such and such were the doctrines of Christ, because somebody said so, and that Christ was an impostor because those doctrines did not square with his notions of reason and divinity. The tone of his work is presumptuous, scoffing, ribald, dogmatic, insolent. . . . Such a work could have but these effects—to encourage lewd reprobate boys in pursuing the course dictated to them by their fierce, unregulated passions, on which the religion of the Bible was their only practical check, and to impel devout, reverent, exemplary Christians to a deeper dislike of infidelity in all its forms, judging its intrinsic character by this God-defying manifestation."

Mr. Wm. Lewis, of the same state, forwarded it to us with an inquiry as to its falsity. We sent it to the Tribune repeating the inquiry; the following note is the result:

"NEW YORK, Feb. 9, 1892.

"MR. E. M. MACDONALD, THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette place, New York, Dear Sir: Your note of the 3d inst., inclosing a note from Monroe, Michigan, is just at hand.

"We have been searching the files of the Tribune for 1850, but have not found the editorial to which reference is made. And judging from the extract itself, I should say that it is very unlikely that it was written by Mr. Greeley, or was published in the Tribune. I return it herewith, and am,

Very respectfully,

"D. NICHOLSON."

We agree with Mr. Nicholson that Mr. Greeley was not the man to have written it, inasmuch as he was the first president of the New York (now the Manhattan) Liberal Club, and held the office for many years, which organization particularly delights in celebrating the birthday of Thomas Paine and honoring his memory. The extract reads much more like the ranting of some little Christian minister than the deliberate opinion of a great editor.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "Paine's Great Works Complete" (3.00). This edition of Paine's works contains a picture of Paine, of the statue proposed to be erected in Chicago, and of his monument in New Rochelle.

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers" ($3.00). By D. M. Bennett.

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a cloth-bound copy of "Bible Myths" ($2.50).

On Abraham Lincoln.

Every seat in the big Broadway Theater was sold clear to the top gallery last Sunday night, the standing-room was all occupied, the stage crowded, and hundreds turned away unable to get in. It was the largest audience ever assembled at the theater. The occasion was the lecture of Colonel Ingersoll on Abraham Lincoln. Colonel Ingersoll spoke for over an hour and a half, and the audience listened with intentness to a magnificent tribute to a grand man. Lincoln was one of Colonel Ingersoll's own sort—gentle, loving, and wise—and the greatest of orators had a most congenial theme in recalling the career of one of the greatest of statesmen.

The reports in the daily papers are of course but fragmentary and disjointed. But by special permission THE TRUTH SEEKER will print a full and accurate report next week, with thanks to Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Farrell for the opportunity.

Acknowledgment.

Credit for a proper missionary spirit must be given to Charles P. Ludwig, T. N. Sherman, and Charles Wolsfeld. They want something done with Congress and the Christian superstition generally, and to have it done the two former send us a dollar each and the latter three dollars. The money has already been used for the purpose indicated, and the gentlemen will please accept our thanks for their welcome aid.

Seattle, Wash., is not a particularly pious place, but the Christians there are just as ugly as those anywhere. Two weeks ago two men were arrested for sliding downhill on Sunday, a most horrible crime as all will acknowledge, and it is surprising that the justice did not sentence them to state prison instead of discharging them.

The Theistic discussion between Miss Chapman and her numerous critics in THE TRUTH SEEKER recently has aroused John Peck, of Naples, and he sends us a contribution telling what he knows about God. Those who know Mr. Peck's pungent and epigrammatic style will realize that when we print it—the week following Colonel Ingersoll's speech on Abraham Lincoln—the Jewish Jehovah will get a raking over which would throw him into an old-fashioned passion if he were anything but a myth.

These are the views of the state of Illinois, officially expressed by its senate and house of representatives, upon the power of Congress to virtually enact a Sunday law for that commonwealth: "WHEREAS, There is now enjoyed by the people of the state of Illinois the reasonable liberty of devoting the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, either to religion exclusively or to religion and rest or to religion, rest, and recreation, without undue restraint; and any attempt by the Congress of the United States by compulsory legislation or otherwise, to determine which of these modes of Sunday observance shall prevail anywhere within the limits of this state is deemed by our citizens entirely beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, an encroachment upon their liberty and direct and dangerous opposition to the genius of American institutions." There is some slight hope that Congress will itself take this view of the matter and rescind the Sunday-closing clause of the World's Fair appropriation.

It is good news which our special correspondent at Paris, Tenn., sends us of the trials of the Adventists there. The Christian persecutors of their fellow-Christians have about given up the attempt to jail the despised Adventists and there are hopes that the supreme court of the state will render a decision making future persecutions under the same law impossible. It is more than noteworthy—it should be burned into the Christian memories, and particularly the Adventists' memories—that this persecution has been stopped by the rulings of a Freethought judge—Judge Swiggart—who presided. Our correspondent's compliments to him—considering that the correspondent is a church-member—are graceful and well deserved. The principles of the judge are of the greatest moment in cases like these.

The Washington correspondent of a Western paper writes of Ingersoll's recent incursion into Washington: "Once in a while 'Pope Rob' comes over from New York, and takes the best theater for a Sunday evening service. Instead of passing the plate, he piratically demands a $1.50 per chair for the best seat, and fifty cents for the peanut gallery, which he fills with ladies and gentlemen instead of negroes and boys. He never fails of a crowded house. Instead of a thirty-minute discourse which seems too long for fifteen, he holds that brilliant crowd entranced for two hours of solid and rapid oratory; and he goes home with over $1,000 of our offerings. His recent historical discourse on Voltaire was one that every lover of human liberty might profit by hearing."

The fanatics of Denver, Col., led by an imported bigot, are trying to close the theaters of that city on Sunday evenings. The prospect of their success may be learned from this paragraph in the Denver Times of last Monday: "The crowded theaters last night was an evidence of what people think of the crusade against Sunday amusements. At the Tabor Opera House there was standing-room only within a very few minutes after the doors were thrown open, and Herr Stark and his popular Hungarian orchestra were vociferously cheered as soon as ever they made their appearance. It was the same at Wonderland and East Turner Hall. Both places were crowded to the doors, and the happy, merry crowds seemed bent on showing by their plaudits how much they appreciated the Sunday amusements."

Once upon a time—and much more recently than when "pigs drunk wine"—in this country beautiful female slaves used to be sold to licentious men and the money used for the glorification of God (or for the support of the church, which is the same thing). It is good to know that this degrading custom has vanished before the onward march of civilization, but its relics still remain among the Methodists, if we may believe a church paper, which prints this paragraph:

"The Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal church will hold an auction social at Union Hall on Tuesday evening, January 17th. Forty beautiful ladies will be sold at auction, and the gentleman who bids the highest will escort to partake of a sumptuous repast, which will be prepared for the occasion. One of the most enjoyable times of the season is anticipated."

The purchase of women seems to be the last prerogative the religious people are willing to give up. But it is a matter for sorrow that women will allow themselves to be sold for any purpose. It is a defect in their natures, however, for which religion is solely responsible. The godly men of the Bible purchased wives and concubines, and the godly women of the Bible were in many cases what we now call abandoned women. The women of to-day, even if they are pious, ought to be away and beyond the coarse females who figure in those barbaric pages.

It has for some years been a surprise to us that Liberal lecturers would so lower themselves as to consent to stand on the same platform with such a person as Clark Braden, or that Liberal societies or individuals would consent to treat with him when he "challenges" them to produce their representatives. Braden has lied concerning every prominent Liberal in the country; has slandered their families, and applied to the great body of Freethinkers the foulest epithets his low imagination could coin. He is himself a fugitive from justice—being under indictment in Missouri for disposing of mortgaged property—yet has the indescribable impudence to ask decent folks to hold converse with him. The latest victim of this blatherskite is Mr. Charlesworth, a newcomer in the lecture field, and possibly therefore excusable. A partial description of the encounter will be found elsewhere in this paper, though it will not be found as Mr. Charlesworth wrote it. Our columns are not to be soiled with the language of the rowdy and the dive-frequenter, and that excludes a perfect report of one of Braden's speeches. Mr. Charlesworth promises more next week; but it will be printed only if it is not like Braden's usual "answers" to Freethinkers. The debate at Seattle should be the last one in which a Liberal representative so demeans himself as to meet the odorous defender of Christian superstition. The fur is not worth the clothes spoiled in getting it.

The school-readers of our early New England days had a little story in them which some of the present-day preachers ought to read. A little boy came home to his father one day with the tale of a hundred dogs seen in the street. The number gradually diminished under judicious questioning until, half defiantly and half sobbingly, this embryo revivalist declared he had seen "our Bose and another dog." Some time ago a harrowing tale of sudden death to a whole Infidel club of Newburgh, N. Y., an infliction of divine wrath because a few people made fun of the Lord's agents, was printed all over the country. Not a few wrote to us asking the needless question if such were probably true. The editor of the Newburgh Register takes delight in helping refute pious lies, and a short while ago printed this paragraph in his paper: "D. McLaren, of Warren, O., is needlessly alarmed about a story that has been set afloat by a revivalist who has been holding forth in that city. His alarm has caused Mr. McLaren to write letters to a number of Newburgh people asking for a confirmation or a denial of the story. The revivalist in question is a Mr. Potter, and at a church gathering he told of the fearful end of the members of an Infidel club in this city. He said they burnt a Bible, baptized a cat, and gave communion to a dog. The same night two died in bed, one had a fit and died, and within five years two starved, seven were drowned, eight shot, five committed suicide, seven went to the gallows, and one froze to death, while three died what were called accidental deaths. What a nonsensical story for any divine or layman to tell an intelligent congregation. Think of seven persons going to the gallows in one city within five years, and all members of a single club! That man needs the services of Mrs. Van Cott or Dr. Reed to convert him from the lying habit. The only basis known to exist for the story is the fact that back in the thirties some men baptized a dog. The divines of the city 'roundly pounded' the parties interested in the act. Ward Gazeley, an epileptic, who was editing a paper, became deeply interested in the discussion, and while writing an editorial article in defense of the men whose characters were assailed—not the act itself—died in his chair from an apoplectic stroke." "Our Bose and another dog" were a multitude beside the remains of Revivalist Potter's blood-curdling yarn.

A "Card" from Mr. Westbrook, in reply to Mr. Putnam, and a short and pithy letter from E. C. Walker in reply to Mr. Westbrook will be printed in the next issue.

THE Newark Liberal League, 177 Halsey street, corner of Market.—Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock, J. E. Remsburg will speak on "Five Hundred Flaws in Christ's Credentials."

FRANKLIN STEINER will lecture in Chicago Sunday evening, March 25th; in Cincinnati April 2d, and would like engagements in the states of Iowa, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. His address in Des Moines, Ia.

A Tribute to a Generous Man.

While in Dowagiac, Mich., recently, Colonel Ingersoll had an opportunity which must have pleased him greatly, which was to dedicate a new theater to the memory of a generous man and a Liberal. And his short speech is another gem added to our literature. He said:

"Nothing is nobler than to plant the flower of gratitude on the grave of a generous man—of one who labored for the good of all, whose hands were open and whose heart was full.

"Praise for the noble dead is an inspiration for the noble living.

"Loving words sow seeds of love in every gentle heart. Appreciation is the soil and climate of good and generous deeds.

"We are met to-night not to pay but to acknowledge a debt of gratitude to one who lived and labored here—who was the friend of all and who for many years was the providence of the poor. To one who left to those who knew him best the memory of countless loving deeds—the richest legacy that man can leave to man.

"We are here to dedicate this monument to the stainless memory of Philo D. Beckwith, one of the kings of men.

"This monument, this perfect theater, this beautiful house of cheerfulness and joy, this home and child of all the arts, this temple where the architect, the sculptor, and painter united to build and decorate a stage whereon the drama with a thousand tongues will tell the frailties and the virtues of the human race, and music with her thrilling voice will touch the source of happy tears—this is a fitting monument to the man whose memory we honor—to one who, broadening with the years, outgrew the cruel creeds, the heartless dogmas of his time; to one who passed from superstition to science, from religion to reason, from theology to humanity, from slavery to freedom, from the shadow of fear to the blessed light of love and courage; to one who believed in intellectual hospitality, in the perfect freedom of the soul, and hated tyranny, in every form, with all his heart.

"To one whose head and hands were in partnership constituting the firm of Intelligence and Industry, and whose heart divided the profits with his fellow-men. To one who fought the battle of life alone, without the aid of place or wealth, and yet grew nobler and gentler with success.

"To one who tried to make a heaven here, and who believed in the blessed gospel of cheerfulness and love, of happiness and hope.

"And it is fitting, too, that this monument should be adorned with the sublime faces, wrought in stone, of the immortal dead, of those who battled for the rights of man, who broke the fetters of the slave; of those who filled the minds of men with poetry, art, and light; of Voltaire, who abolished torture in France, and who did more for liberty than any other of the sons of men; of Thomas Paine, whose pen did as much as any sword to make the New World free; of Victor Hugo, who wept for those who weep; of Emerson, a worshiper of the Ideal, who filled the mind with suggestions of the perfect; of Goethe, the poet-philosopher; of Whitman, the ample, wide as the sky, author of the tenderest, the most pathetic, the sublimest poem that this continent has ever produced; of Shakspeare, the king of all; of Beethoven, the divine; of Chopin and Verdi, and of Wagner, grandest of them all, whose music satisfies the heart and brain and fills imagination's sky; of George Eliot, who wove within her brain the purple robe her genius wears; of George Sand, subtil and sincere, passionate and free, and with these, faces of those who, on the stage, have made the mimic world as real as life and death.

"Beneath the loftiest monuments may be found ambition's worthless dust, while those who lived the loftiest lives are sleeping now in unknown graves.

"It may be that the bravest of the brave who ever fell upon the field of ruthless war was left without a grave to slowly mingle with the land he saved.

"But here and now the Man and Monument agree, and blend like sounds that meet and melt in melody—a monument for the dead—a blessing for the living—a memory of tears—a prophecy of joy.

"Fortunate the people where this good man lived, for they are all his heirs—and fortunate for me that I have had the privilege of laying this little laurel leaf upon his unstained brow.

"And now, speaking for those he loved—for those who represent the honored dead—I dedicate this home of mirth and song, of poetry and art, to the memory of Philo D. Beckwith, a true philosopher, a real philanthropist."

Science and Progress.

An Unanswered Question.

"Will you kindly let us know what you mean by heaven?" asked a Freethinker who conducted his own defense during the recent trial of the Antwerp Socialists. "Heaven" ("le ciel"), replied the quick-witted lawyer, "is a place I am afraid you will not see when you die, my friend." But the Socialist, too, was pretty good at repartee. "Oh, you need not tell us," he remarked, "that I shall have to share the common fate of humanity in that respect."

Wailing in Vain.

The financial crisis in Portugal has reached a point that reduces the government to the alternative of announcing the bankruptcy of the nation or of confiscating the estates of the monastic orders, who have so long drained the lifeblood of the people and inculcated the superiority of faith to science. The English creditors are getting peremptory; but the government still hesitates—probably to give heaven a fair chance to work a miracle in favor of the church.

The Old Gentleman.

The theological mountebank who has had the honor to accompany the American charity commission to St. Petersburg, still spouts hosannas in praise of his reception, and calls the imperial despot "in all respects a born gentleman." There is a story of a Sunday-school youngster who referred to the prince of darkness as "the gentleman who lives in hell."

One-Sided Virtues.

Thomas de Quincey tells a suggestive anecdote about a committee of Eton schoolboys who called upon Commodore Sidney Smith, the paladin of the Syrian expedition, with sore misgivings that they would be dismissed after a brief matter-of-form reply to their rehearsed little speeches. To their surprise they were eagerly welcomed, and requested to call again and accompany the hero of many battles to a hall where the aldermen of the city had prepared a public ovation. It afterward appeared that the prospect of that ceremonial had appalled the distinguished commander, and that he had invited his escort for the special purpose of "breaking the concentration of the public gaze." There are bullies who turn pale at the thought of seeing their names in the local newspaper, and moral heroes who shudder at the sight of a spider. Countless members of so-called temperance societies indulge freely in coffee, tea, tobacco, and unwholesome condiments. Life insurance agents could tell curious stories of "cautious" individuals whose dread of death deters them from railway trips and winter sports, but who night after night breathe the lung-destroying miasma of unventilated bedrooms. In 1863, when the Philippine islands were visited by a dreadful earthquake, the citizens of Manila sold their very household goods to raise funds for the relief of the sufferers; yet the same models of benevolence wage a war of extermination against the Negritos, the aborigines of the highland districts, and maintain a brigade of professional manhunters who shoot and poison human beings as they would the carnivorous beasts of the wilderness. The virtue of truthfulness, too, is apt to become specialized, and many of our pious fellow-citizens who would stick to facts even in a horse trade, think it highly meritorious to lie for the glory of Jesus.

Reckless Vengeance.

A Virginia negro evangelist is trying to boom his revival by representing the recent snow-tornado as a divine judgment upon the multitude of American unbelievers. If the messengers of the Lord have really whirled on white wings of that kind, their zeal appears to have got the better of their discretion. The Sabbath-breakers of Cincinnati and New Orleans got off with a mere sleet-storm, while in the strictly orthodox mountain districts of east Tennessee the retributive snow fell to the depth of forty-five inches.

Alcohol Ethics.

The Chicago Champion, the official organ of the Liquor Dealers' Association, calls the advocates of temperance a lot of "maundering sentimentalists," and charges them with trying to ruin industries of infinitesimal value in order to diminish the "noise of a few inebriates." The noisiness of the liquor traffic is perhaps not its most pleasant feature, but it might be questioned if the Prohibition party proposes to connive at the practice of the "speak easies." The Champion, by the way, quotes scripture, and ornaments its headings with a stack of angel-protected beer barrels.

Dream Revelations.

Inspired dreams are not a privilege of Christian zealots, and their occurrence has been recorded centuries before the beginning of our chronological era, but the gods of paganism appear to have used that expedient at least for manlier purposes than the spirits that troubled the sleep of hysterical nuns. Thus Livy (II, 36) mentions the case of a man whom Jupiter commissioned in a dream to summon the senate and express the God's anger at the cruel treatment of a slave during the public games.

Western Buddhists.

The Theosophists of the United States claim a rapid growth of their brotherhood, and there is no doubt that in California the kindred sect of Neo-Buddhists is making hundreds of converts. The presence of eighty-five thousand Chinamen may have something to do with that curious reversion to the Oriental sources of Christianity, but the moral contagion of the Buddhist root-dogma has asserted its power at all times and under all circumstances. It is based upon the tendency to life-weariness, incident to an over-refinement of civilization, as well as to periods of national affliction, and the hope of final refuge to the sanctuary of eternal sleep may be the secret solace of millions who have never heard the name of Buddha Sakyamuni.

A Fatal Ally.

The disasters of Marshal Daun, the Austrian champion, during the Seven Years' War against Frederick the Great, date from the year when the successor of St. Peter sent him a consecrated sword and a hat ornamented with an image of the Holy Ghost. King Alfonso of Spain died a few weeks after his holiness had invited him to accept the presidency of an association for the defense of his temporal rights, and the rapprochement between Dom Pedro and the holy see was followed almost immediately by the outbreak of the Brazilian revolution. France, too, has experienced a series of reverses since the vicar of Christ declared in favor of the republic, while a hundred years ago the repudiation of his alliance was followed by an unparalleled succession of semi-miraculous victories over the united armies of orthodox Europe.

Barefoot Agnostics.

Dr. G. H. Kellogg, who recently visited the City of Mexico, states that several Indian tribes in the land of our next neighbor have lost their ancient religion without having acquired that of their Christian conquerors. "The average citizen of the United States," he says, "is certainly unconscious of the fact that so vast an extent of uncivilized territory lies so close to his native land. Outside of the cities, which can certainly not be said to be numerous in Mexico, the civilization of the natives is much inferior to that of China and Japan. By far the great majority of the aborigines are un-Christianized, as well as uncivilized. The Spanish conquerors appear to have done little in the way of substituting anything for the civilization which they destroyed almost to complete obliteration." In Peru, too, there are thousands of creedless forest-dwellers (the inhabitants of the vast eastern foothill region known as the Montasso), and the Araucanos of southern Chile content themselves with practicing a sort of divination. They have augurs who endeavor to read the decrees of fate in the entrails of slaughtered animals; but that oracle is consulted only in special emergencies; the hunters and herders of the valiant nomads, as well as the hard-working squaws, are too busy to trouble themselves about supernatural concerns, and the augurs themselves frankly admit their ignorance of questions concerning the mystery of the hereafter.

F. L. OSWALD.

Called Away.

That Sabbath eve the bells tolled forth,
Calling the blessed to prayer.
And as they went they sorrowing cried,
"It's our preacher's last night here."

"Among us his work has never tired,
He's labored hard and long;
But now another call he's got
And ere long will be gone."

No comfort could these sorrowers find,
And here he used his art.
He told them 'twas the will of God,
That thus we all should part.

He said, the Lord had called him forth,
To rescue Christ from spoilers,
But forgot to say, the other church
Pays one more thousand dollars.

WILL HARRINGTON.

Little Blasphemies.

If cholera is due to the wrath of God it is because slop barrels "smell to heaven."

Surface: "It was brave of David to overcome Goliath with a sling and stones."

Rowley: "Yes; but youth will have its fling, you know."

Why I Am Not a Christian.

I am not a Christian because I am unable to accept as truth statements intrinsically improbable, such as constitute the historical basis of the New Testament. I do not say these accounts as given are impossible, but they transcend the range of ordinary human experience and are therefore improbable.

To accept these or any other improbable narratives ought to require a very different kind of evidence from what would be sufficient in ordinary historical matter, where the events described are probable in their nature and sequence. It seems to me that anything short of personal knowledge would be unsatisfactory to anyone who has given attention to the abnormal propensity of the human mind for the strange and unearthly, and the consequent ease with which the myths of one country and religion are transferred to another. Second-hand evidence to such an inquirer in matters pertaining to the miraculous is valueless, regardless of what the character or number of the witnesses may be; and especially in the case of the New Testament, where it takes a miracle to prove a miracle, are we justified in withholding our assent.

All the knowledge we possess of Jesus Christ comes to us from Christian sources. It is derived from the four gospels written by men actively engaged in the propagation of the new religion. It is not claimed by the latest Christian apologists that these gospels were written during the life of Jesus Christ, or immediately following his death; but the earliest, that of St. Luke, was written about A.D. 79, or fifty years after that event. Ample time for the myth element to develop, even without the special incentive that we might reasonably expect would influence these writers. But just here these apologists posit a miracle to answer this reasonable conclusion. To use the language of one: "The earlier production of the gospels was unnecessary, as the story was repeated orally so often and with such care as to render it impossible that imposition or misstatement could creep in." Yet from Mosheim and other ecclesiastical historians we learn that the first centuries of the Christian era were known as the age of pious frauds, that fraud was prevalent even in the Christian church beyond the date assigned for the appearance of the gospels, that the principle was even earlier adopted by the sectaries of every belief that to advance the cause of right—that is, their cause—by deception was commendable. What assurance have we that this principle was not acted upon by the evangelists? But more than this, the mythical character of the gospels is proved beyond a doubt, for they do not possess the merit of originality. The history of Jesus Christ is but a metastasis of that of Buddha Sakyamuni and Buddha's that of the old Indian god Krishna. All the principal points in the history of each are common to all, while the concordance between Buddhism and Christianity is that of identity—traditionally and dogmatically.

Both Buddha and Christ were of royal lineage. Both were born of a mother who, though married, was still a virgin. Both virgin mothers were overshadowed by the Holy Ghost and though found with child remained immaculate. The birth of both is announced by a heavenly messenger. Both husbands of these virgin wives renounce their conjugal rights until after these gods were born. A star in the East heralded the birth of both. In both cases angelic messengers announce the tidings of great joy. Wise men bring gifts and worship both. The Brahmin Asita in the case of Buddha, and the pious Simeon in that of Christ, have the advent revealed to them by the Holy Spirit. Each visit the new-born child and utter very similar rhapsodies over him. Both dispute with the doctors, who marvel at their understanding. Both have a forerunner who announces their mission. Both return to the desert and undergo a long fast. Both are tempted by the prince of darkness. Both go down into a river, Buddha to bathe, Christ to be baptized; the heavens open and a shower of fragrant flowers descend on Buddha, a dove on Christ. Christ holds an interview with Moses and Elias on the mountain, Buddha with the two Buddhas who preceded him. From under the fig tree both choose their first disciples, who were, in both cases, disciples of their heralds. Each appoints seventy apostles, selects five favorite disciples, and afterward increases the number to twelve, one of whom tries to betray his master and meets a disgraceful death. The Sermon on the Mount is a repetition from the sayings of Buddha. The woman at the well is told of Buddha. He walked upon the Ganges, healed the sick by the mere touch of his hand, and was the original in the miracle of the loaves and fishes. At the death of Buddha the earth trembles, rocks are split, phantoms and spirits appear. Almost exactly the same is told of Christ. These and many other analogies bespeak the derived character of the Christian tale and that it was impossible to have been true of Jesus Christ.

The plagiarism of the New Testament was well known and understood by the learned pagans of the second and third centuries, and to meet this charge Christian apologists claimed that the history of Jesus Christ was copied beforehand by demons in order to destroy its effect when it should appear.

Stripped of his borrowed garb what remains to us of Jesus Christ? His existence seems uncertain. His character as teacher and as a pattern of self-sacrificing devotion to what he believed to be the good of his fellow-men remains. He was unquestionably an Essene; and who were the Essenes? Nothing more, nothing less than a Judaized sect of Buddhists, the fruit of that propaganda of Asoka now known to have swept over the empires of the Seleucids and the Lagards two or three centuries before the Christian era, and where missions and churches were numerous established. In the time of Christ these communities, separated from the parent stock by conquest, had by contact with Magianism, Mithracism, Judaism, and influenced largely by Greek thought, developed germs that afterward grew into the mighty tree of Gnosticism with its hundred branches. Of these the Judaic Buddhists wandered least from the original faith. Jesus Christ preached the doctrines of Buddha Sakyamuni, modified by the eschatology the Jews had imbibed from their Persian conquerors.

The proofs of this lie in dogmatic concordance of Buddhism and Christianity. The root-dogma of Buddhism is anti-naturalism. Unlike every other ancient religion, prior to the advent of Christ, it demands the renunciation of all the pleasures and enjoyments of this life and the complete abnegation of self-existence, which is regarded as an infliction that can only be cured by death. The indulgence of our natural instincts, no matter how innocent their character, is a deadly sin. Submission to injustice and tyranny is enjoined. It teaches that virtue and merit consist in renouncing earthly possessions, living upon alms, dressing in rags, abstinence from marriage; that everything beautiful in nature or art, the pursuit of human knowledge, affection for kindred, anything that excites pleasurable emotions, ought to be suppressed, as it interferes with the highest wisdom, which consists of self-denial and self-abhorrence.

It is easy to see that the inevitable outcome of the practice of these doctrines means the destruction of industry and lapse into ignorance. It generally followed; material prosperity must die and earth become a waste. To endure injustice passively is to invite fresh encroachments from the oppressor. It obliterates self-respect and independence, two of the noblest qualities of the human mind, and introduces an element destructively to social life.

Let us turn to the doctrines of Jesus Christ. He is represented in the New Testament as sanctioning, by his example and command, mendicancy, and from this authority the mendicant orders in the Catholic church have arisen. He condemns human knowledge and commands the wisdom of children and the unlearned. He dwells upon the merit of poverty, and speaks of the possession of riches as a crime. He interdicts industry, commanding that no provision be made for future wants. He inculcates self-renunciation and the doctrine of penance, suffering here being one of the essentials for happiness hereafter. Celibacy is meritorious; passive submission to injustice he distinctly enjoins; hatred of kindred, hatred of life, contempt for everything that makes for human comfort or pleasure, he repeatedly avows. In short, his is a religion of pessimism like which there is only one other, that of Buddha.

We are told that Christianity is the sequel of Judaism, the New Testament the complement of the Old. It seems incredible that such a view could ever have obtained. In the Old Testament every command, every inculcation had for its object the rapid increase of the race, especially the Jewish, careful regard for sanitary conditions, imposing and sensuous displays for the gratification of pride and national vanity in the dispensation of religion, industrious and prudent methods for the accumulation of material wealth, and everything that tends to give ease and permanence to a people. In the New Testament everything is exactly reversed; there is nothing like concordance between Judaism and Christianity; there is identity between the latter and Buddhism.

I want to call attention to the result of this propaganda of Buddhism. Its advent into western Asia, northern Africa, and southern Europe, found these countries enjoying a civilization without parallel in the history of the world. Throughout the limits of the Roman empire, peace and material prosperity reigned, human life and tenure of property was well secured, schools of philosophy and institutions for the dissemination of learning were founded in every city or town which crowded the confines of that mighty empire. Agriculture had reached a high state of perfection; the peasant, secure in the fruits of his labor, was contented and happy. Public baths were open to all. Works of art abounded, architecture was grand and noble, literature sublime and beautiful. To be sure, a despot reigned at Rome, but at his worst he could scarcely cause a ripple on the general sea of prosperity and contentment.

Slowly began the change. Christian fanaticism found in every element that went to make this mighty success a foe to the Christian scheme. It began a warfare against art and destroyed all it could reach of the divine creations of the great Roman artists. It attacked literature, and we have only its mutilated fragments at the present day. It destroyed the baths and inaugurated an era of dirt, so that for hundreds of years a man's piety was measured by his filth. As soon as its power was assured, it abolished the schools of the philosophers and forbade every kind of learning except such as was dispensed by its priests. Agriculture waned, tenure of life and property became more and more insecure, until at last held only by sufferance of the strongest; until, after the lapse of a thousand years, we behold as the effect of this system a mental and moral obscurity so dense that we wonder at the returning light that surrounds us now.

Whence came this light? Its first glimmerings coincide with the unrest that began to disturb the bosom of the Christian church in the early part of the sixteenth century. It broadened and deepened just in proportion as the anti-natural tenets of the Galilean Buddhist were repudiated. The name Christian has survived, but the thing, except in Roman Catholic communities, is largely a thing of the past. Christ is still worshiped, but the root dogma of his religion, pessimism, is sparingly preached and never practiced by respectable Christians.

The mendicant Christian of to-day goes by the name of tramp. He who takes no thought of the morrow as shiftless and undeserving. He who sells all his possessions and bestows them upon the poor, or who seeks divine favor by self-mutilation, as insane. He who has no appreciation of the beautiful in art and literature as coarse and vulgar. The Christian who does not insist upon his rights in a manly way is looked upon as a fool and unworthy respect. Communities that practice Communism or celibacy are put outside the pale of Christianity altogether by the great mass who go by the name Christian. Were Jesus Christ to visit a Christian community at the present day he would not recognize a single feature of the cult as emanating from the peculiar doctrines he preached.

HIRAM C. BROWN.

A New Explanation of "the Fall."

Being greatly amused by the article of Ella E. Gibson, and admiring the plucky fight of the little heroin struggling in the dark and turbid waters of which there is no "bottom," I am impelled to "fish" her out. The whole Bible, and all similar books, have been written by people who had very limited information on the subjects treated, and, consequently, drew on imagination to supply what ignorance left undone. The result is always the same. Our little heroin has done just this, and her article, like the Bible, is partly true and partly not true.

There is no doubt but that the Hebrews at the time they heard the story were polytheists, as other peoples have been. If the first verse of the Bible were translated correctly it would read thus: "In the beginning created gods [there are no capitals in Hebrew] the heavens and the earth." The Hebrew is: "Beréshieth bahrah elohim ha-shamahyim wehaharets." The word elohim is the plural and means gods or spooks or some such trash. The word shamahyim is also in the plural and means heavens, skies, clouds, air. It is used four hundred times in the Old Testament. It is translated in one place as "wheel," meaning that which turns round, showing, of course, that they were geocentrists. There is a Chaldean form (shemayin) used about forty times in Ezra, Jeremiah, and Daniel. It occurs in the singular only two or three times. Paul (Cor. xii, 2) tells about a man "caught up even to the third heaven." Notice that the singular of elohim is elohé, and the form el means "god." Pronounce the accented é as in they. Each a in the Hebrew quoted sounds like a in farther. The reason why the translators used the singular is given in the usual "smart" Latin gag: "Pluralibus excellens," that is, "Plural of excellence." The reason why the pronouns were not translated in the singular is not for lack of "smartness," but for lack of pronouns. The Hebrew has no present, future, or pluperfect. It is difficult for one to see why there are no pronouns in this phrase unless they are familiar with a foreign language. In Latin, amo, amas, amat, must be written I love, you love, he, she, or it loves. This 26th verse in the Hebrew starts out: "wiyomer elohim nacé adam besalménu kid muthénu." These are very close to the original sounds, and read: "and elohim - [gods] said we-will-make, or let-us-make man, in-image-our according to-likeness-our." The only evidence we have of a pronoun in nacé—"let us make"—is the letter n, which is one letter of the first person plural, we, and is woven into the verb; so "in our image" the suffix nu is only the fragment of a pronoun tied on the tail-end, and really ought to read "image-we."

The serpent was created first. I am speaking according to the myth, as I understand the question was relative to it. The serpent was among the "soul-of" life of the creeping things and the very same word, "soul-of," is applied to man.

This craftiness of the serpent is altogether previous. How could it have been crafty when Adam and Eve knew nothing? You will notice that "father" and "mother" are used in ii, 24, when no such relations had yet existed.

The word "rib" is not found. "And-he-took one from-sides-his and closed flesh instead-of-it;" and the following verse should read, and does read in Hebrew, "and built Yahwé Elohim the side which he took from the man for-woman." The question is: Of which side was Eve built? and the answer is: The other side. Now, Adam could not know that any of his sides was taken away, because he was hypnotized, and he probably prevaricated.

Here is the 18th verse, ii, as it reads in the original: "And-said Yahwé Elohim: not good being of man to separation-his; I-will-make for him help as-over-against-him." And iii, 19, should read, "sweat of thy nostrils."

In iv, 1, we see Adam knew his wife. The word know is identically the same as is used in iii, 22, to know good from evil, and we are to infer simply that he recognized her as different from the beings around them. Eve says, "I have gotten a man with Yahwé," which we are to believe as strictly accurate. Her eyes were too well opened to admit of any of this innocent gush. Simply Adam was not in it. Now in the very preceding verse it reads, "And so he drove the man out." There is nothing said about driving the woman out. We conclude he had use for her, and did not then drive her out; and her testimony is pretty strong evidence of the correctness of this reasoning.

I do not rest my case here. There is still stronger evidence for believing that this beguiling was altogether of another character. Eve was tampered with either by Yahwé or this crafty serpent; Cain and Abel were not sons of Adam, but they were of Eve. The generations of Adam, Gen. v, are given; but there is no generation of Eve; and in that genealogy Cain and Abel do not appear. There is not the slightest doubt but that some such transaction as this is woven into the old Chaldean story, and written up in some fairly attractive way.

The word Yahwé originally signified "he who causes rain to fall" and had no divine attribute. After having filled that office for a while, it began to be associated with fear and dread; when it began to be recognized that lightning somewhat caused, and accompanied rain, and when the lightning struck anyone, or a building or other object, it was awe-inspiring. Thus fear of Yahwé, as lightning, was driven into everyone's head. And to-day, I have heard it still said, where I should expect better things, that fear of God is the beginning of all wisdom. It has been very clear, for a long time, that the hand of a third compiler is very distinctly seen in Gen. ii, 4. More anon.

News and Notes.

Dr. McGlynn lectured to a large audience last Sunday evening, and was enthusiastically greeted. He speaks well and evidently has no fear of the church authorities. His subject was "The Politics of the Lord's Prayer." This was admitted by the doctor to be a somewhat advertising title, for as a matter of fact, it is pretty difficult to find any politics in the Lord's Prayer. The doctor did not analyze the prayer. He merely confined himself to the first two words, "Our Father," and his lecture was a discourse on the "Fatherhood of God" as the necessary foundation of political morals. His text was merely a gateway by which he entered into a discussion of what might be called "transcendental politics," and in which both his strength and his weakness were displayed. As Father McGlynn is a representative man it is well to understand his position thoroughly.

In the first place Father McGlynn is a born churchman. He believes in the church as an institution of human progress. He does not believe that the present church organization is perfect, but he does believe that the basis of the church is correct, and that the church must be maintained in spite of its mistakes. Father McGlynn is a Catholic, always has been a Catholic, always will be a Catholic. He is built that way. He is thoroughly religious and a most ardent believer in God. To him a belief in God is absolutely necessary to the support of the moral law. He is utterly antagonistic to Atheism and Agnosticism. He considers these to be stumbling-blocks in the path of civilization.

It will thus be seen that Dr. McGlynn is not a Liberal, never was a Liberal, and never will be a Liberal. With this understanding the attitude of Dr. McGlynn is perfectly consistent. He has not changed, nor has the church of Rome theoretically changed in its treatment of him. Dr. McGlynn was not a heretic. He has always been a follower of the church, but not blindly. He has exercised his own judgment; he is humanitarian; he is in sympathy with the toiling masses and would do all in his power to relieve human suffering.

Dr. McGlynn believes in the trinity, the divine incarnation, and the authority of the church. He believes in the supernatural, the mysterious, and accepts through faith that which is above and beyond his reason. Therefore he is, and always has been, in harmony with the fundamental ideas of the church of Rome. Had he ever surrendered a single cardinal doctrine of the church his reinstatement would have been impossible.

The difference between McGlynn and the pope has been merely a question of interpretation, and not of any doctrine. The shrewd advisers of the pope have found out that Dr. McGlynn is in touch with the people, that hundreds of thousands of the members of the church are with him, and to cut him off would inflict a terrible blow upon the power of Rome. What is the result? With cunning diplomacy the church has accommodated itself to the spirit of the times. Rome has not surrendered a single vital point—not a single claim. It has simply shifted its position, with the wisdom of a serpent, but it has not lost a fang. Neither the pope nor Dr. McGlynn has triumphed. They have simply agreed to disagree on an incidental question, but join forces still in essential matters.

Dr. McGlynn appears to be very broad in his theology, much more so than an orthodox Protestant, but he is supported in his position by the greatest theologians of the church of Rome. For instance, Bible critics say that the Lord's prayer is not original with Jesus. "I do not care whether it is or not," says Dr. McGlynn. Why? Because all revealed religion is founded on natural religion. Without natural religion there would be no revealed religion, as without reason there would be no faith. Faith must be founded on reason, and revealed religion must be the expression of natural religion. Therefore, whether the Lord's Prayer was uttered by Jesus as revealed religion, or was expressed in anterior literature as natural religion, it has for us the same value and the same authority. "Many utterances outside of the Bible," says Dr. McGlynn, "are inspired of God." This is something like the position of Dr. Briggs, and is rank heresy, according to the Presbyterian creed, but is sound philosophy according to the great teachers of the Catholic church.

However broad-minded Dr. McGlynn may be, and humanitarian, he has never really stepped outside the magic circle of the church. He has never been unsound in theology. It has all been a question of political economy.

There is an impassable chasm between Dr. McGlynn and all true Liberals. He affirms that morality is based upon the existence of a God—that without God there is no such thing as moral law. On this deepest intellectual point of all he vaunts the power of the church and degrades humanity. No wonder the church opened its doors. If God is necessary, then of course the church is necessary as the representative of God.

The only way to maintain liberty is to dethrone God. He who affirms that the moral law of man is based on the existence of a deity is not the absolute disciple of freedom. He is in favor to a certain extent of chains and slavery.

Human rights are self-evident, but God is not self-evident; God is not a demonstration, but an object of faith, an "incomprehensible object," as Dr. McGlynn admits. If, therefore, human rights are founded upon God, and God is not self-evident, then human rights cease to be self-evident. They are remanded to the realm of faith, and therefore come under the control of the church. We hold our rights, therefore, by the sanction of the church, and there never was a tyrant yet who was not delighted with a proclamation of this sort.

Dr. McGlynn's position on this point is perfectly orthodox, and places him in opposition to universal human liberty. I admire the honesty and fearlessness of Dr. McGlynn, his eloquence and philanthropy, but he is not with us, but against us, intellectually, and because he has thus laid the foundation-stone of the church's authority he is welcomed into its bosom, and Rome, with its usual far-sighted policy, has avoided minor antagonisms, because of this unity on a question of supreme and universal importance. The sole foundation of all human morality is human liberty itself, but Dr. McGlynn puts in the place of liberty an undemonstrable deity, and this deity is the corner-stone of the church itself.

With this explanation the reconciliation of Dr. McGlynn with the pope is easily understood.

The Sunday-opening question drags its slow length along. It is almost impossible to get the committee together to make any report or settle the matter one way or the other. The Illinois delegation is unanimously in favor of Sunday opening, and on the line adopted by the Illinois senate and assembly would push the repeal of the Sunday-closing clause on constitutional grounds. But the difficulty is to bring the matter in any shape before the house. Benjamin Butterworth published an elaborate article in the Washington Post in favor of Sunday opening, but Sunday opening of such a character that I could not indorse it. With his restrictions the World's Fair on Sunday would be almost as solemn as a graveyard. It would be pervaded by a holy silence unbroken save by the sermon and the prayer and song of worship. It seems as if the gloomiest Puritan might be satisfied with such a tribute to the sanctity of the Sabbath as this proposed compromise. But the average Congressman knows better. He understands the power of provincial bigotry, and he says to the inquiring reporter:

You see, I am debarred from public utterance on this matter. Personally, I believe that the opening of the gates on the Sabbath, with no machinery running and no liquor sold, will be a great thing for the workingman, who is compelled to toil six days in the week. It would be hard upon the Chicago saloons too. But there is a wonderful lot of church people in my district who are opposed to what they call a desecration of the Sabbath, and they vote just as hard and often as anybody.

I am constantly meeting with just this plea. The votes of church people bulldoze Congress. Where are the votes of the Liberal people? Are they not to be counted? The necessity of the Freethought Federation was never more manifest.

Representative Houk of Ohio proposes a modified Sunday opening. Among other regulations he would have no restaurants for the benefit of the sightseers. That would be fasting if not prayer with a vengeance. Think of a hundred thousand people on the grounds with nothing to eat, and this by act of Congress. The only possible way for poor devils to get a bite would be to celebrate the Lord's supper. What a crowd there would be around the communion table. I think after several hours of hunger even my Infidel stomach would like a little bread and wine, and I would even eat "a piece of God" to satisfy my cravings for a beef-steak. Can the farce of religious folly any farther go?

I want the World's Fair on Sunday to be just as interesting as on any other day of the week, full, live, splendid, joyous, noisy with laughter, gaiety, sport, mirth, children playing, shouting. I want all the paraphernalia of a magnificent entertainment. I want art, poetry, industry, the picture, the statue, the machine, in sparkling splendor. I want humanity to be broad, free, beautiful, merry on this great day. I want gay costumes, decorated pathways, jolly melodies. I want infinit joy and every kind of beauty and attraction for the World's Fair on Sunday, or let it be shut up with the black wings of superstition over it, and let the people know by an image and symbol that none can dispute what a damnable thing is the orthodox religion. No compromise at all. In no way, shape, or manner do I want the World's Fair to recognize the sanctity of the Sabbath. Let it recognize simply the humanity of man, and the glory he has accomplished.

Senator Quay since his election is not quite so chipper on the Sabbath question. He is not so anxious to help God now that he is secure of his Senatorial dignity. The following good story is told of this pious politician. It is not in the Congressional Record but is nevertheless veracious. On introducing his resolution to close the Fair on Sunday he carried to the clerk's desk a copy of the Bible open at the twentieth chapter of Exodus. Handing it to the clerk Mr. Quay pointed to one of the verses and dramatically commanded: "Read that. It's the eighth Commandment." The clerk, who has a loud and resonant voice, began in his most stentorian tones: "Thou shalt not steal."

It took the Senator several minutes to recover his equanimity and the fourth Commandment.

The Six O'clock Club, a literary and social institution of Washington city, met last night around the festal board. Among other speeches by W. A. Croffitt, well known to Liberals, Major McElroy, of the National Tribune; Hyland C. Kirk, and Mrs. Sara Spencer, I made a short address in favor of opening the Fair on Sunday, and with but one dissenting voice the club voted for Sunday opening, machinery running and all. This shows the drift of the intelligent public opinion. Some day it will be felt and the peanut, pious politician will disappear.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

To a Minnesota Congressman.

CROOKSTON, MINN., Jan. 10, 1893.

HON. KITTEL HALVORSON, Washington, D. C.,
Dear Sir: Within a short time the closing or opening of the World's Fair on Sunday will again come up in Congress. More than any other thing this question is now agitating the public mind. Even up here in this remote part of the country people are awakening to the importance of the principles involved. The laboring classes are indignant over the closing act of Congress of last year, as they consider it a direct slap in the face, for the reason that the only chance they have to visit the Fair is on Sunday, as everybody will readily see. The poor fellows who have to work the six days of the week in order to make a livelihood have just as much right to see the ennobling and moralizing presentations of industry, art, and science as have the rich ones. Those that are making their bread by the sweat of their brow are just as much entitled to the mental development and industrial instruction that the Exposition offers as anybody else. By closing the Fair on Sundays the opportunities of the laboring classes are shut off and they have just cause to complain.

Furthermore, the liberty-loving population in general are awakening to the fact that the effort of the Sabbatharians to close the Fair on Sunday is a shrewd game played in the interest of uniting church and state. It is therefore well to remember at this time General Grant's wise advice when he said, "Keep church and state forever separate."

The Sabbatharians claim that they want the Fair closed for the sake of good morals, but the people at large are now aware of the fact that the Sabbatharians themselves, in order to impose upon Congress, manufactured bogus petitions by the wholesale and that in several states they presented far more names than the entire population within the respective borders. In Michigan, for instance, 1,500,000 more petitioners than the entire population of the state prayed Congress to close the Fair on Sundays. What a monstrous fraud! And still these bigoted Sabbatharian cranks pretend to plead for morality. How can fraud and morality be reconciled? Another class of people too are in this case pleading for the cause of morality—the saloon-keepers. How would it look to other nations—Christians, Mohammedan, Buddhist, Brahministic, and the highly civilized Japanese—to see the Americans close the World's Exposition on Sunday and keep open the saloons? I hope that Congress will repeal its hasty action of last year and I hope that the American institutions will be upheld, and that the wisdom of the founders of our republic in separating the church and state will prevail. I am afraid that I take up too much of your time, and can hardly expect that you will find time to read a much longer letter, but an incident, or rather a discussion, I ran into before election, will probably interest you. In the New York TRUTH SEEKER I wrote an appeal to R. G. Ingersoll to pronounce for the People's party and our ticket. For this I was vigorously attacked by Freethinkers, and it was the Sunday-closing act and the vote of the People's party members in the case that they used as an argument, and there are no doubts that the People's party lost thousands of votes on account of it. Now, I do not believe that the People's party intends to unite church and state. I believe there is enough intelligence and foresight in the party to see the danger of it. There are enough religious strifes as it is, and if the churches should be given the smallest chance in that direction they would all of them, all the one hundred and eighty different Christian denominations in this country, commence to strive for supremacy. What that means everyone can see. I hope our party will not do anything in a way to subject our government to church rule, as we all know what that means. History tells its story about church rule (and its rule of sword and fire), and to-day we see Russia with her Christian church rule, a living hell. When George Washington said, "In no sense is this government founded on the Christian religion," he no doubt knew what he was talking about, and the only safeguard is to follow out Washington's and Jefferson's wise course. Just look at the Catholic church now, grabbing out for the control of our common school. It must be stopped.

There are no earthly reasons why the World's Fair should be closed on Sundays, and I defy anyone to show even a single solitary ground from a religious point of view, consistent with the Christian religion. It is conceded from all sides that the Bible Sabbath is not Sunday but Saturday, and scripture says that "whosoever doeth any work on the Sabbath day shall be put to death." If this law was enforced there would not be anybody left to attend the Fair or any other place. The observance of Sunday as a day of worship was decreed by the emperor Constantine, 321 A.D., and in honor of the sun. Sunday observance was decreed by this cruel tyrant, this Christian monster, who murdered his own wife by suffocating her in a kettle of hot water; the heart-rending ruffian who cut the throat of his own son, and murdered his father-in-law and brother-in-law, and a great many other near relatives, and maintained at his court a set of bloodthirsty and bigoted priests, one of whom was sufficient to incite one-half of the world to massacre the other. I hope that our People's party members will vote for an open Fair on Sundays. I hope that they will show justice to the living, and not bend their knees before the bloody hand of the dead and buried Roman emperor. I hope my defense for the People's party shall not come to shame. I hope our representatives prove to be as broad-minded as I believe them to be, and thanking you in advance for whatever you may do to open the Fair on Sundays, I remain, Yours truly, OLE E. HAGEN.

P. S.—It is very seldom that the majority is right, but it happens in this case. If the Sunday opening was put to a vote of the people, it would carry with an overwhelming majority. In the name of labor and honest toil, I shall expect a unanimous people's party vote for Sunday opening. The church has always been the oppressor, pious and bloodthirsty. It has always been the archfiend of labor and the enemy of liberty. It is not the church of the real Christ and it never was, but it is the church of that pious perjurer and abominable robber and murderer, the Roman emperor Constantine, called the Great. Not only as a laborer, but as a lover of liberty and peace on earth, I shall ask of our representatives their vote for Sunday opening. I shall ask their vote for honest toil, and I sincerely hope that they will not go into partnership with the disciples of Constantine—these lazy drones who loaf around the whole week and make their living by telling ignorant and superstitious dupes some hobgoblin and fish stories on Sundays.

OLE HAGEN.

Mr. Charlesworth Encounters the Striped Animal.

Since writing my last letter I have given a course of lectures in several towns and cities upon the Puget sound, all of which have terminated in a brilliant success. From Seattle I went to Buckley, where I was favored with large and enthusiastic audiences at each of my lectures, and our friends seemed highly enthused at the result. Martin Gau had made the arrangements for the lectures, and quite successfully too. The town literally swarms with people who are of Liberal thought; my lectures were well received and entire satisfaction was experienced all round. On my way there I called at Tacoma, where E. G. Bixler, secretary of the Tacoma Secular Union, assisted by our indefatigable co-worker C. B. Reynolds, had arranged for me to give a lecture before the society. I was once more favored with a good audience; the members and friends of the Union gave me a very cordial and hearty reception, and liberal assistance too in the matter of finance.

Tacoma is blessed and honored with a large element of enthusiastic Liberals. A splendid society is in active operation here, and every Sunday evening Mr. Reynolds lectures to a crowded house. The chief interesting feature of the society is the large number of lady members, who are active in their efforts to make the society and its endeavors a success. Its business meetings are well attended, and an enthusiasm in the cause is met with here unexcelled by any society in the land. Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Reynolds are unflinching in their work here for mental freedom and the emancipation of the human mind from the thralldom of priestcraft. They find earnest and willing supporters in Mr. and Mrs. Charles Babcock, Dr. and Mrs. Angus, Mr. Howden, George Leon, Mr. Ford and his father, E. G. Bixler, Miss Lucy Lowe, and many others too numerous to mention in these columns.

Port Angeles was my next point, where I gave three lectures, through the efforts of Frank Morse. The Opera House was well filled upon each occasion. Professor Seymour and many other well-known Liberals were among the audience, and my lectures were a great success. A large number of friends signed the constitution of the Federation, and placed their names upon our list of members.

Next I found myself at Forest Grove, Ore., where I gave a course of four lectures. They have a splendid Liberal hall here built by a bequest of Mr. Vert and which the Freethinkers have for their own use. I found a large crowd awaiting me at the hall and they gave me an enthusiastic reception. A Thomas Paine celebration was held on the Sunday morning, which went off in good shape. Our meetings here were enlivened by sweet music. D. C. Stewart is a good worker for our cause, and through him the lectures and meetings were attended with a grand success. The district representative is a well-known Freethinker and succeeded in his election campaign notwithstanding the fact that the name of Infidel was hurled against him as a means to cause his defeat. It is a university town and a large number of the students attended each of my lectures.

I had a close call before me to reach Seattle in time to meet the champion of orthodoxy in debate for six nights. A storm impeded the progress of the train somewhat and I arrived in Seattle at 8:20 o'clock. The time called for the meeting was 8 o'clock, so I immediately hurried off to the Armory Hall and found two or three hundred people awaiting to witness the contest of opinions, the battle of words. Without anything to eat, or even a wash, without time to remove the dust of travel from my clothes, I mounted the platform and was introduced to J. T. Ronald, the mayor of Seattle, who had been selected to act as moderator. We immediately took up our positions upon the platform, and after a few prefatory remarks by the mayor, Mr. Braden led off in the debate upon the first proposition. He is a man sixty-two years of age, about five feet seven inches in height, and weighs about two hundred pounds. He has small ferret eyes which bespeak distrust, a prominent nasal organ, with iron-gray beard and mustache. He had his arguments prepared in manuscript, which he proceeded to read in the form of an essay. The first night passed off well without anything savoring of personal vituperation. I took careful notes of what he said in his first speech, and my first thirty minutes was taken up with a criticism of what he had said. In his second speech he read again from his manuscripts, and never attempted to make reply to my criticisms. So after a brief review of what he had said again, I commenced in my closing argument for the first night an attack upon the language of the Bible, which he had to defend by the terms of the proposition under discussion. Never once did he throughout the whole debate confine himself to the subject at issue, or even to make a decent attempt to answer my criticisms of his own statements, or to answer my objections to biblical doctrine and language. The first night resulted in an overwhelming victory for our side, and the local press gave me a favorable report in their columns. Upon opening the discussion for the second night, he made a frantic effort to meet my criticisms for a few minutes, which he read off again from his paper, having had about twenty-one hours to prepare it. The debate started out well, but on the second night, while I was in the midst of an argument, a hiss was plainly heard by those in the hall. Imagine my surprise and disgust when I knew that it emanated from the "reverend" gentleman on the platform, Mr. Braden himself. This was the first personal attack. I stopped for a moment in my address and gave him a home thrust for his ungentlemanlike conduct, which brought down the house with a perfect storm of applause. From that moment to the close of the debate the sympathy of the audience went on my side. Even ministers of his own sect denounced him for his action, and withheld their support and sympathy from him. The Ministerial Alliance of Seattle, which had indorsed him as their representative, never favored him with their presence, and made themselves conspicuous by their absence. The Rev. Mr. Williams, of Salem, Ore., reproached him for what he had done and urged him to keep his temper and abstain from such conduct in the future, as it would be detrimental to the interests of the church. The second night resulted in a greater victory than ever, and our friends were highly enthused at the way the debate was going. So far I had kept entirely clear from any personal attack upon my opponent, a rule that I had laid down for myself to follow. On the third night he commenced an attack upon the personal character of great Freethinkers, our leaders past and present. Ingersoll, Putnam, York, Bell, and many others came in for their share of the filthiest vituperations that ever fell from the lips of man. I became so incensed at the attitude he had taken in this debate that I could scarcely constrain my feelings; and gave him a bitter shot in return for what he had done. I felt that I had done wrong, perhaps, but my rebuke won me the renewed confidence and sympathy of my audience. I had made an attempt to conduct the debate honorably and fair, but I was foiled in anything of the kind by his slanderous abuse and grossly indecent personalities. From now on I was fully determined to fight the cur with his own weapons. It requires courage to face and confront this infamous disseminator of filth, and to meet this notorious equivocator on such grounds. To be surrounded by people whose very intelligence and freedom revolts at such assaults upon personal character as issued from the mouth of this ingrate, was a task no man of honor need envy. In the course of his remarks he said, "I can always tell a dirty, low-down, mean, sneaking Infidel by the manner in which he will discuss sacred things." To this I gave reply in the following words: "I can always tell a dirty, low-down, sneaking Christian by the hissing noise he would make with his mouth." This brought down a perfect storm of applause. I added, "There were only two animals in the world that hissed, one was a snake, the other was a goose; they both had about the least amount of brains of any animals in the world; and the reverend gentleman could classify himself in the order with either of them that he saw fit." Again the audience broke out in a roar which made Braden wince, not with shame, but with anger. He then proceeded to abuse and insult his audience. He told them "their brains were in their heels, not in their heads," and from this forth he played a decidedly losing game.

The Rev. Mr. Williams, who is pastor of a church belonging to the same sect as Braden, evinced his abhorrence of the man by denouncing him and returning home. Rev. McCallom, of Olympia, followed suit, and the two returned together. It was utterly impossible to keep a fair debate now, all rules and regulations were entirely ignored, the character and sincerity of individuals were assailed by this man of God and champion of the Ministerial Association of Seattle. He called his audience swine, hogs, clackers, geese, serpents, and every vile name that an evil disposed mind could call up.

The church party were dejected; they resorted to falsehood in their attempts to extricate themselves from the mud in which their champion had placed them. The press manifested a respectful silence, but in what little they did say concerning it they carefully omitted to mention his obscenities, although they gave me the best of the encounter. The third night was passed away, the victory to our cause was kept up, and the Liberals went home rejoicing in the conquest we had made.

I shall finish the report of the debate in my next letter.

GRAND FORKS, DAK., Jan. 26, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I inclose two trial subscriptions, a small order for books, and my renewal. I am a poor man but would like to get some more books. The spirit is willing but the purse weak.

Propaganda.

YATES CENTER, KAN., Jan. 25, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I have nearly every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the past five years. I would be willing to give them to any person or persons who would distribute them as samples or in any way that they might do some good. I will send them to any lecturer who is traveling and distributing Freethought literature, or divide them among several. Let me know.

Liberals Want to Meet.

GREENSBURG, PA., Feb. 4, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I see by your paper of February 4th that a writer from Jeannette, Pa., would like the address of the Greensburg writer. I wish to inform him we have an organization here named the Greensburg Progressiv Liberal Union, that meets every Sunday afternoon in Armbrust's Hall. We would be pleased to meet the gentleman from Jeannette any time, and if you will give us his name we will send a committee to wait on him and extend an invitation to visit us.

Will Our Ohio Subscribers Reply to This?

OLD SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME,
SANDUSKY, O., Feb. 2, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Will you please be so kind as to inform the readers of your valuable journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, if the Bible is read in the public schools of Ohio? And also if the public schools of Ohio are opened with prayer? We have put this question to quite a number of the dailies of our state, but can elicit no reply. Hoping you can give us the facts in the case, we are constant readers of your paper, and earnest friends of Freethought and reform,
DR. GEORGE H. BOYD,
GEORGE BAKER.

The Meanness of the Baltimore Press.

BALTIMORE, MD., Jan. 30, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed the address of Father Stafford. This is a new departure, for a Catholic prelate to appear before a free discussion society. He was replied to most effectively by a Freethought Liberal, and notes were taken by a reporter, yet not a word of the reply was published in our city papers—which shows the meanness of our Baltimore city press. Mr. Putnam has delivered two or three lectures before this association, not a word of which could be got in our papers. He was not present at this meeting. Verily, our press is muzzled.
E. LIVFZEY.

Lectures or Books.

COLES, ILL., Jan. 11, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for four books, entitled, "Age of Reason," by Thomas Paine; "Travels in Faith," by R. C. Adams; "My Religious Experience," by S. P. Putnam; "Bible Morals," by J. E. Remsburg.

We thought we were going to have a Freethinkers' lecture by J. E. Remsburg in this month, but I see we are not billed in THE TRUTH SEEKER. He wrote us he would be here in January, but I guess he has forgotten us, and if we cannot have the pleasure of hearing a good lecture we can read his books. I will close and wait with patience for the arrival of the books.

Yours respectfully, JOSEPH S. JOHNSON.

Changes His Mind When He Pleases.

ELSINORE, CAL., Jan. 30, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: The illustration of January 21st representing the harvest-home of inspired witchcraft is one of the best projections of Mr. Heston's genius which it has ever been my good fortune to contemplate. Although there is at this time a Methodist revival in progress at Elsinore, I have received the right of religious liberty which I believe to be accorded to an American citizen, by hanging the picture in my office window—as I am in the habit of doing—by the side of the last Wasp's colored cartoon of "The Modern Samaritan." Of course I shall be abused and preached about and cursed, but, brethren, I am with you always when it comes to doing what I think is right and changing my mind when I think I am wrong. Very truly,
F. H. HEALD.

A Champion Truth Spreader.

ILWACO, WASH., Jan. 6, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I, too, say, let us put laurels on the brow of the great and splendid man. Only Wilson Macdonald should have said, a monument of figures of flowers, wrought in the finest of marble, with the deserved emblems. Ingersoll has voiced the first great psalm of morn—Truth and Love. We owe him a debt of gratitude. With a few TRUTH SEEKERS and a Bible Picture Book I walked to town, five miles, and sold ten Bible Picture Books and induced E. J. Colvin to subscribe for the paper and a book. Friends, if you would put your shoulder to the wheel right the lift would not be so hard. My way of overcoming the repulsive atmosphere that generally surrounds book-agents is by complimenting myself like this: "Friends, with this staff I have walked five miles. My $8 pension will not keep wife and me both, but she is loyal to the cause of Truth and Liberty, and goes out and works to keep back the wolf, and if I should sell a hundred books I would not make a cent." All of which is a fact. In our heart we carry your burden, but this is all we can do at present.

Whoever Helps Ecclesiasticism Is an Enemy to His Country.

PELLA, IA., Jan. 26, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I wish to send a list of names for membership in the Freethought Federation of America, as I regard it as one of the grandest movements that have ever been made. But simply to get men to consent to have their names sent in for membership upon my explanation of the objects of the order, occurs to me to be superfluous. I want every man whose name I send in to feel that anything that has any appearance of ecclesiastical usurpation is of vastly more importance than party affiliations, and is sufficient cause to brand a man as an enemy of, and traitor to, our institutions and the liberties of our country; hence I would suggest that we have printed preambles with blanks for names written by each one wishing to become a member. The object of this method is that each one may fully understand the nature and importance of the obligation he is taking when he signs his name. It may be that such plan has been adopted. If so please send me a few preambles with blanks attached, and I will get as many to sign as possible and remit on receipt of same.

A Secular Funeral.

GRAND RAPIDS, MINN., Jan. 25, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Your old subscriber Lizzie P. Hawkins died suddenly on Nov. 20, 1892. She died as she had lived, a consistent Liberal. And following out her oft-repeated request, she was laid in her last resting-place without any priest or preacher or religious service of any kind. My brother, H. H. Hawkins, late candidate for lieutenant-governor in this state, delivered her funeral address. He paid a glowing tribute to the memory of one whom, as my cherished wife, he had known for eighteen years. He spoke of her ability and perfect honesty; and though many Christians were present, there was not a dry eye in the audience.
For many years my wife and myself have worked side by side in the ranks of Freethought, in this state, in California, and Arizona. We have many friends who can only learn of her death through the columns of our home idol THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hence at this late date I write you of the sad event. I should have done it long ago, but was at the time blind, and have only been able to read or write for a few days.

L. H. HAWKINS.

The Impudence of Preachers.

WAGENER, I. T., Jan. 23, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: The following does not come properly under the head of "Crimes of Preachers," yet I think it worth communicating to you. One Methodist "sin-killer" who had been "sent" to the charge at Tahlequah, Ind. Terr. (capital of the Cherokee Nation), by name Elliot, for 1892, was—as usual—a constant beggar, and not only this but last spring actually sent a note to every member of his flock asking them to send their children around to hoe out his garden. Some of the poor fools did so, and he stood among the little fellows with an umbrella over him directing the work. This is what I term "gall." And only such hypos possess it.

I read THE TRUTH SEEKER. My friend Wells has gone and left it to me. When his time expires I shall subscribe for it myself. "The Bible in India" long ago established my former convictions upon all the subjects of religion. I am a great admirer of Mr. Ingersoll.

Infidels are plentiful out here, but they are not much on reading. Yet I think I shall be able to send you some subscribers soon.

I like G. E. Macdonald, of Snohomish. Mr. Putnam's argument is by all odds the clearest on the subject of any I have seen.
G. A. PLACE.

Not Surprising, for Preachers Are Professional Thieves.

HUBBARD, Jan. 23, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: I send you a small list of names of men who, I think, would like to see THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I sometimes think we are a little too hard on the poor preachers. A friend of mine tells me this little story: "I went to Pittsburgh the other day, and took a seat in the car immediately across the aisle from a clerical-looking youth. This person had on the high-cut waistcoat and frock coat of a preacher, and he wore the look of one of the oldtime itinerant psalm-singers, who thought the cooking of Sunday meals was a sin against the Lord God. This particular youth had the melancholy look of a man who had lost his best friend and was himself on the road to perdition. The newsboy soon came through the car and distributed packages of candy, leaving one on the seat beside the theological student, and went on to the next car. No sooner was the boy gone than the sanctimonious youth carefully opened one end of the box and abstracted six or seven of the tissue-paper-wrapped candy-balls and closed the package. He removed the paper from one and put the candy in his mouth, then opening his grip he took out his Bible and commenced to read. I was beginning to be interested in this religious thief, and watched when the boy came back. He shook his head when asked if he wanted to purchase one. This hypocrite then read his Bible until Pittsburgh was reached, in the meantime eating the candy he had purloined from the boy." Do the commenting yourself, but believe me, the story is absolutely true.

Yours for the truth,

ADAM ARCHBOLD.

A Sample Lie.

TRINIDAD, COL., Jan. 15, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for the renewal of your valuable paper. I have tried very hard to get some new subscribers, but my efforts have been of no avail. I shall send you a few names of persons who call themselves Freethinkers. I have thought several times, like our Liberal brother Shumaker, that I would have to discontinue THE TRUTH SEEKER for a while, but I do not see how I could get along without it.

I feel happy to know that we are to have Brother Charlesworth to lecture for us in April. I think it will arouse the Free-thinkers of our community somewhat and perhaps put them to work in the Liberal cause.

You publish a great many books I should like to have, but I shall have to defer getting them until fortune smiles on me more plentifully.

One question I wish to ask you. If you can answer me, please do so through the columns of your dear, good paper. When and where did a Catholic priest by the name of Lambert make our famous orator Col. R. G. Ingersoll take a back seat in an argument on religion? I think you will know if such is the case. I have seen no such argument in any journals or papers. A gentleman in this city told me so. I told him I did not believe it.

One of the Salvation Army women asked me if I thought I would get to heaven. I told her, yes, if there is a heaven I would. She said, "Be careful you don't get left behind." I said, "Don't you believe it. I will sit on a higher seat in heaven than you will." She walked out and said no more to me.

May success crown your every effort in the advancement of Freethought, and also Brother Heston's. I remain,

Yours truly for truth and liberty,
MRS. C. A. BERLETH.

[The answer to your question is, Never and nowhere.—ED. T. S.]

Search for Truth Never Displeasing in God's Eyes.

WAUSEON, O., Feb. 1, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a good work in educating the people and broadening the minds of seekers of the truth. In that notable interview between Mrs. Annie Besant and the late Dean Stanley, the latter said: "Remember that our God is the God of truth, and that therefore the honest search for truth can never be displeasing in His eyes."

In accord with such Liberal views is the address recently delivered by Col. J. H. Brigham, master of the National Grange Patrons of Husbandry, on the occasion of the death of a neighbor who was a Freethinker. The following is the extract:

Our friend and brother did not accept the views and beliefs entertained by many of our people, but he was a firm believer in the greatness and goodness of an infinit God. And as he saw and understood his character and teachings, he trusted to him. It is not for you and me to say he should have discarded his belief and have accepted ours. He, like all of us, must finally meet the judge of all the earth, and when that time comes we will not be tried by any creed of any church, but will meet face to face a just and loving father who will not condemn without reason. "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" In the hands of that judge we leave our departed friend and brother.

Broad-minded humanitarians are surprised at the action of certain persons who are striving to close the World's Fair on Sunday. And the most disreputable means are adopted by the bigots to accomplish the closing. The fact that the "pious frauds" claim 4,050,518 names from Michigan when that state contains only 2,093,389 people is a sample of their scalawagism. THE TRUTH SEEKER's leaflet on the World's Fair closing should have a wide circulation. The plea that this is a Christian nation is another of the mistakes of the superstitionists. The Father of this Nation, George Washington, above his official signature in the treaty with Tripoli declared: "The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." He further said, "The United States is not a Christian nation any more than a Jewish or Mohammedan nation."

JAS. H. SHERWOOD.

A Brush With the Enemy.

LAKEPORT, S. DAK., Jan. 19, 1893.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, for which please send me the following books: "Force and Matter," $1.50; the great Ingersoll controversy, 25 cents; "Did Jesus Arise?" by Saladin, 25 cents; total, $2.50.

I have just finished reading Ingersoll's "Interviews on Talmage," and think it is, for keenness of argument, and sharpness of sarcasm, far above anything I have ever read.

Your paper is also a welcome guest. I think it contains nothing but good and useful information.

I wish you would admit to your columns a few words which I have to say concerning a "minister of the gospel." A few days ago there happened to pass through this section of the country one of those semi-lunatics who claim to be called by the "Holy Ghost," a "servant of the Lord," etc. Being asked where he was from, he declared that he was one of a company of missionaries, consisting of three hundred members, sent out by "the missionary society." He was dressed up like a gentleman, with plug hat and white linen, and his conversation was that of a first-class religious crank. He stopped here one night, as this happened to be the first house he struck; and as Infidels are always kind and hospitable, even to preachers, he was of course invited to rest himself overnight from his weary travel during the day, in searching for lost sinners. He tried pretty much to stuff some of his religious nonsense down our throats, such as "to become one of the Lord's children," to "consecrate ourselves entirely to Jesus Christ," etc. The reader may judge as to how far he succeeded. However, he soon made known his business, which was that of a missionary beggar, after a religious discourse in a neighboring schoolhouse. But, alas! his speech had made but little effect, or he had failed to make the right combination with the holy trinity, in order to make the Holy Ghost work on the audience, as there was but one contributor.

I remain, yours as ever for Freethought,
J. C. NELSON.

Women Will Abolish What Little Liberty We Have.

NUNACH, CAL., Jan. 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: There is one question among the multitudes discussed in THE TRUTH SEEKER which I think most Freethinkers do not see in its true light, and that is woman suffrage. Now that the Freethought Federation of America is an established fact it behooves us as intelligent electors to closely examine, from more than one standpoint, whether our sisters, mothers, and wives should share with the men that greatest of responsibilities, the ballot. As our work as members of the Freethought Federation of America will almost wholly be to keep church and state separate, we should look more closely at that side of the woman suffrage question than any other. Mrs. R. H. Schwartz, of San José, Cal., in an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 24, 1892, has won my lifelong admiration for her sensibleness (a scarce article with the fair sex, by the way). She says: "I want to vote, but I would rather die without voting than see women vote now. . . . It is highly necessary to arouse her to her position in the Bible, church, and dress reform. First, she must realize the littleness of dress, novel-reading, gossip, etc., and that outside of this limited space her mind is blank." Truer words were never spoken. Liberals surely must be aware that nearly all preachers and very religious people desire the women to vote. Why? They want their help and co-operation in their damnable work of putting God in the Constitution. With the women composing half of the population of the country, and about four-fifths of the congregation of the land, we have an army, and as an army must have leaders this one is led by the priesthood, that at one fell swoop at the ballot-box can annihilate what little personal liberty Comstock, Harrison, and Wanamaker have left us. Think of the danger to our treasured freedom of conscience if the fanatical Woman's Christian Temperance Union, led by that very able female suffragist Miss Frances Willard, were turned at large with the ballot in their hands. There are Liberal-minded women, it is true, but in what ratio do they stand as compared to men? The Liberal woman's vote in a general election affecting some religious issue would be snowed under so badly that the late lamented Harrison would not be in it. I am aware of the fact that most Liberal papers, including the old standby, THE TRUTH SEEKER, advocate woman suffrage. In an issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER some months back, in an editorial reviewing the obnoxious parts to Liberals of political platforms, the editor says about the Woman Suffrage plank in the Prohibition party platform: "They (the Prohibitionists) are fair enough to allow the women to vote." I would say they are smart enough. If people imagine that plank was put in from any sense of fairness to the fair sex they are woefully mistaken. Were women allowed to vote, the Prohibition party would not be the political cipher it is to-day. A lady schoolteacher, a strong female suffragist, told the undersigned a short time ago, "If we could only vote we would soon put a stop to the liquor business, and the first thing we would have would be a Sunday law in California." Nice to contemplate, is it not? The preachers have abandoned the Prohibition party, and are flocking to the standard of the People's party, the party of the Masses, the Lassies, and the Asses. Although in their platform they did not come out flat-footed for woman suffrage, they threw out some mighty strong hints. Almost all of the leaders, writers, and speakers of the party are in favor of woman suffrage, and I have met very few People's party men, at least here in California, who were Freethinkers. There is no use to deny the fact, religion has a strong hold on the women, and the preachers are smart enough to recognize the fact. Duty to God before man would be the women's political battle-cry. (I speak about the majority of women, of course.) No, fellow-Freethinkers, woman is not free-minded enough to have the power of the ballot in her hands. The time will come, I doubt not, but at present it would be the death of the Freethought Federation of America.

ALBERT SANDBERG.

We Must Be Surprised at Nothing That Credulity Does.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It was with much pleasure that I read your editorial note saying that Geo. E. Macdonald would again be heard through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. For one, I think his long and profound silence in the shade of Puget sound has been a moral crime against Freethought and the great family of Freethinkers that derived so much benefit and satisfaction from his mental powers and the products of his brain. No Freethought writer has been more widely missed than he in his temporary disappearance, and his legion of friends will rejoice at the chance to renew his literary acquaintance, and to forget now and then that life has a stern and serious side. Since Freethought suspended and failed to make its weekly visits on this coast, it has seemed as though an old acquaintance had climbed the golden stair; for we had got so used to the weekly supply of fresh and facetious thoughts from the Man With the Badge-pin, that their cessation was like cutting off the liquid refreshments of a man accustomed to his daily dram. I think, however, that his long silence will be generally forgiven, provided he does not repeat the offense.

I would further remark, that next to the writings of the man mentioned above, the pictures of Heston seem to fill a "soul want," and so lifelike and accurate are some of them that I wonder at times if he does not catch the facial expression of some of those old chicken-eaters with a kodak and transfer it with a pencil. In his "exact description of the clergy" he must have taken them from life, or had a flash of inspiration; for all are so true to nature and the profession that they only lack the power of speech to convince one he is gazing on the real presence. That old Methodist parson in the group I have seen a thousand times, and I guess everybody else has; and the Church of England man I am positive I knew back East. That description in words which Jeremiah gives is too accurate to admit of question, and both should be widely circulated as missionary documents for our church. I was also particularly pleased with Gabriel's picture, for it revealed a knowledge of heavenly characters not to be expected from an old resident of Missouri; and the fact that Gabriel had adopted one of our latest classical productions in music goes to show there has been an imitative progression in heaven, where "Old Hundred" has held sway so long and delighted such easily pleased audiences. Heston seems destined to rival the ancient Hogarth as a satiric artist, and the follies of the world make him a necessity. While a single trace of superstition lingers in the mind of mortal man, Heston's pencil and Macdonald's pen will remove it if anything can.

Annie Besant has just delivered two lectures here on Theosophical subjects, and while I sat nearly two hours at one of them, with pencil and paper to jot down an idea new or startling, I failed to catch one; and came away feeling as a man does who partakes of an oyster stew at a church entertainment—that he has been the victim of misplaced confidence. Her ability as an orator is unquestioned, for the past is too full of evidence, but Theosophy, that compound of wind and words, that jugglery of tenuous theories, affords little scope for oratory based on common sense; and based on anything else it can never be effective. Why this once brilliant Materialist has absorbed a doctrine that reason has no use for, and demonstrated facts have no connection with, will remain a puzzle to those who watch the mutations of the human mind. Her mind is now absorbed and mystified with a double triangle marked with Sanskrit letters that signify sat, which means, in the king's English, existence; and other characters on this six-pointed enameled star worn on the right shoulder, signify aum, which is another "sacred" word, meaning the principle which underlies all existence. Having read more or less about this sacred word aum, and the proper way to pronounce it to generate power and set force in motion, I recalled to mind what Voltaire said about such sacred words in his day, and would recommend its careful perusal in this. When persons surrender reason to such trivial things they are fast approaching that mental condition where it will require no effort to believe the walls of Jericho tumbled at the blast of a ram's horn. Credulity apparently has no limit and we must learn to be surprised at nothing.

We are making arrangements to properly celebrate the birthday of the grandest character in human history, Thomas Paine, and hope for successful results.

Prof. W. C. Bowman will establish the Church of the New Era next Sunday in this city, and it is expected to be a Freethought organization.

REV. DR. C. SEVERANCE (Devil's Church).

An Archbishop's Foolish Babblings Rebuked.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Jan. 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: A few months since Archbishop Janssens, while officiating at a funeral, said: "The church prays for the dead. There is a life beyond the tomb, the life eternal, with its countless myriads and myriads of souls, gone to their last account, for eternal reward or everlasting woe!"

This everlasting woe doctrine is still the drawing card of the church, which is so profitable to the high priests, for it gathers in the tithes; without it the pews of these structures of superstition would be as empty on the first day of the week as on any other day. Though there is no doubt that there are many priests and preachers who themselves do not believe in this hell doctrine, yet they cannot very well afford to abandon the preaching thereof, for well they know that the time would be near at hand when they would have to toil for an honest living in another capacity. It is astonishing that people in this enlightened age will still believe such bosh, that an all-merciful God would damn man, his own creation, to everlasting woe because he has made him imperfect, so much so indeed, that at one time it repented him very much of having created him at all, in consequence of which he concluded to drown all save a few, and he an unchangeable and perfect God at that, supreme in his wisdom, incapable of making any blunders.

He continues: "The souls of those who die in the faith are not forgotten by the church. She is an ever-remembering mother, and when her children die she intercedes for them and obtains assuagement of their punishment in the other world, if by any sins of omission or commission they have been temporarily denied access to the realms of the blessed. This custom of praying for the dead is sanctioned by the holy book, for it is written therein that, after the battle between the children of God and their enemies, Judas Maccabeus sent silver offerings to the high priests for the purpose of offering services for the repose of the souls of the dead soldiers."

That caps the climax! Is not such preaching and teaching encouraging to the evil-doers? Is it not a consolation for the criminal to believe that, even after his death, the silver offerings sent to the high priests by his relatives or friends will secure him a clear pass? Correctly Thomas Paine says: "The invention of purgatory and of the releasing of souls therefrom, by prayers, bought of the church with money, are revenue laws without bearing that name or carrying that appearance."

But what else is the so-called holy book but a fabrication of man, and where can we find a book which contains more demoralizing, obscene, and immoral reading matter than that very one? Those who honestly believe in a God ought to consider that so-called holy book the most blasphemous publication ever manufactured by man—as an insult to their God. But this practice of praying and interceding for the dead by the church, I suppose, is only established for the wealthier classes; the poor seem to have a poor show; they may console themselves by reading the scripture: "Blessed are the poor, for such is the kingdom of heaven," and this is a great consolation indeed, for well they know—and many have experienced it—that if the shekels are not forthcoming punctually, no goods will be delivered. I know of several instances in which the high priests refused to officiate unless the silver offerings were paid in advance. Here is one: A poor man, personally known to me, whose earnings are but $41 per month, lost his fifteen-year-old son. He went to the priest and told him of his sorrows and misfortune. This good servant of the Lord expressed his sympathy, but told him he could not officiate at the funeral unless $25 were paid in advance. The poor fellow explained his condition to this good man, and after much pleading the bargain was reduced to $20, then to $15, to $10; and at last to $5, with the understanding that it had to be paid cash in advance; that services would only be held at the house, and that a carriage would have to be sent to the parsonage to convey him to the house of deceased and back to parsonage, although the street-car was passing within half a square of both places. Now this hard-hearted scalawag did not care a farthing if he took the last cent out of this poor man's pocket (which in fact he did, as he had to ask his employer for an advance of pay), even though he did not have the wherewithal to buy bread for his wife and children the next day; the meanest money-shark could not have acted more contemptibly. Verily, there are none so blind as those who will not see. But as long as they bow to priests they will not see, and as long as they will not see, but blindly believe, we must continue to fight this monster of superstition. Blind belief has been, and still is, fattening thousands of priests; blind belief still prevents thousands of Protestant preachers to sacrifice their fat salaries for truth; it still is the cause of many being sent to insane asylums; it hurls discord into the happy family by the fireside, etc., etc.; therefore curse to this blind belief which is the cause of so much misery. Let all lovers of justice and mental freedom do their share to destroy these doctrines of superstition and fanaticism until mental slavery will be a thing of the past. True, that time is still distant, but it will surely come.

ERWIN HUFFRUTH.

P.S.—Robert Ingersoll has arrived—that is, not the great orator and teacher of humanity, but a little stranger, well and hearty, made his appearance on the 4th inst. (for further information see letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 22, 1892, page 683). With our two boys, the eldest a bright little lad of six years, who will in the near future be one of Miss Wixon's Cornerites, we exclaim: "Home is our heaven." It is needless to mention that no priest or preacher will be called upon to perform the baptism ceremonies of orthodoxy.

E. H.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Coming Woman.

She's just a rosy little lump,
Laughing, kicking, cooing;
She keeps her nurse upon the jump,
Seeing what she's doing.

She talks, and says "Ah goo, ah gee!"
And doubles up her fist;
But when you take her on your knee
Her eyes are all a-mist.

She cries and shrieks as if she's mad,
Or hurt, or sadly scared;
To hear her sob you'd think she had
Most seriously fared.

She's always wanting this or that—
There's naught she does not dare—
From morn till night, both soon and late,
She needs a deal of care;

And now she's playing peek-a-boo—
A little vixen, she—
Who pinches, bites, and scratches you,
Then chuckles in great glee.

She reck's not of the world outside
Or cares its work to greet;
She's no ambition and no pride
Its varied ways to meet.

But she's a charming, darling one,
Deny it, ye who can;
So full of frolic and of fun,
She's the coming woman!

—Susan H. Wixon in Woman's Tribune.

All Children Are Mine.

The mother of two wee mites, Nonna and Trenn, was dead, and they had just removed the body to the morgue. Nonna was a baby of four years, while Trenn was two years and a half older, but little more than a baby himself. The father and husband had failed in business and died, leaving his wife a half invalid dependent upon her needle for the meager support of herself and two little ones—so meager that they were often hungry and cold.

"The brats 'I hav ter go to the poorus," remarked one.

"Less old Mag Jones takes 'em ter beg 'ith, or suthin," said another.

"Their marm was tu grand an' hupper crusty tu liv in our vicinity, an' that's w'y she kicked the bucket," added another.

"Poorus, beg, Mag Jones," rushed through poor little Trenn's mind, and when unobserved he took his little sister by the hand and walked away with her.

"Where we going, brother?" she asked.

"I don't know, darly."

Trenn often called her "darly," and sometimes only darl, instead of darling. They wandered on and on, stopping sometimes to rest until they saw the great ocean like a sheet of glass in its tranquillity spread out before them. They walked down to the water's edge just before the sun sank below the horizon. The sky was overcast with heavy clouds, and the great luminary was thus invisible until they had stood there for a moment, then they parted just sufficiently to allow one golden ray to gleam upon the sea.

"Oh, see, brother!" exclaimed Nonna, "see the pretty path of gold. It's jes' wide enough for us two, less we walk on it."

"Yes," replied Trenn, "we will, but we must be careful and not get shaky, because we are so hungry, and fall in the water. A man they call a minister said mamma was walking streets of gold now, and perhaps this gold path goes right to where she is."

"Oh, won't that be sp'endid—only we's so hungry we most falls down, but we'll be careful, and mamma will giv us some supper when we find her, won't she, brother?"

"Yes, piles and heaps of it, darl', just all we want; but oh, oh, it's gone now; the gold path is gone!" he cried.

"Oh, oh, it's gone, it's gone!" wailed the baby.

"And we won't see mamma or hav any supper," sobbed Trenn. "O dear, O dear!"

"What's a beg, and a poor'us, brother?"

"I don't know, darly; I don't know. Something awful I know by the way that bad man said it."

"What makes you cry and talk that way?" asked little Atha Merton, who had been watching and listening to them unobserved for some time.

"Because mamma is dead," replied Trenn.

"Tause mamma's dead," echoed Nonna.

"My mamma isn't dead," said Atha, "and you come right home with me and she will take care of you."

"Oh, will she? But we isn't her children."

"Yes, you are, because I hav heard her say many times that all children were hers, and all little boys and girls were my brothers and sisters. But here comes mamma now. Oh, mamma, these little children's mamma has died, and they don't want a bad woman to hav them, or go to the 'poor'us' I guess they mean poor-house. Won't you love and take care of them?"

"Certainly I will," replied mamma. I hav plenty of room in my heart and home for two more children. Come, dears, just up this little hill."

"Oh, I tant," said Nonna. "I'se so hungry and shaky, and my 'tomach aches so I would fall. I'll has to stay here."

"Are you so hungry as that, you little darling?" and she lifted the baby in her arms and with Atha helped Trenn up the hill and in the house. They were given a nice warm supper, but not too much because they had fasted so long, and then were put to bed. In a few days they were well and happy, loved and loving; and Atha, being an only child, was delighted to hav a brother and sister and to be no longer lonely. I wonder how many mothers can truthfully feel and say, "All children are mine." I fear they are not many. Yet there are a few who hav sufficient of that divinest of attributes, love, to do this. One dear woman in this "City of the Angels," when I thanked her for doing a great kindness to my daughter, replied: "You thank me for doing a kind act to your child. Your child? Is she not mine also? Why, I feel that all children are mine."

If we had a heaven upon earth—as I hope we will hav some time—I believe that not only mothers, but all people will feel likewise. Shall we not, old and young, work and strive to attain this great end?

Little children, begin first by trying to feel like Atha—that every little boy or girl you meet or know is your brother or sister. Then, if your mammas hav not already felt this, when they see their darlings' loving fraternal spirit they can not help saying: "If they are Susie's, and Mamie's, and Roy's, and Robin's brothers and sisters, they must surely all be my children. Yes, all children are mine."

Chats With Correspondents.

ETTA M.—We are indeed pleased to hear that you will soon be well again. Good health is better than religion, better than wealth or fame. Thank you for your kind interest in the Corner.

SADIE A. M.—Wish we had time to write you a good long letter in return for yours. You must take the will for the deed. "Claud," the story, was lost, but is found again. It is all right for the Corner some time. Hav sent you papers, and will send more another time. You are not well, but do not be discouraged. Health will come again.

J. F. GONZALES.—We did not think you intended it for publication. Hav never heard whether the nurse of George Washington was white or black, but think it likely that she was black, as such were, and are still, nurses of the children of South-erners.

GEORGE A.—Do not fear to show your true colors. It is not best to be too aggressive, but always stand for the right. Sustain yourself well, and read that you may hold your own in argument.

KATE B.—Yes, THE TRUTH SEEKER is reliable. It does not make incorrect statements knowingly.

JOHN B. F.—Five and six novels a week can never do you or anyone good. It is dissipation to read so many. Many novels are not worth the time to read them. Read history, travels, and books of science. Read few books of fiction, if any, when books of truth can be procured. The list by F. M. Holland recently published in the Children's Corner is a good one to select from. Send for TRUTH SEEKER catalog. Liberal books will help you and also the authors and publishers of the same.

JANET C.—Yes, read the Bible through if you hav time. It is the best way to discover its errors, inconsistencies, falsehoods, and foolishness.

PUBLIC SCHOOL.—Please giv your real name. The schools are the bulwarks of our civilization. They cannot be too closely guarded, and should be entirely secular. Good morals in place of religious teaching should prevail in schools supported by public money.

Correspondence.

Feb. 5, 1892.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I want to speak a good word for the Children's Corner, also for the Little Freethinker. We need more Corners and more papers for the children instead of less, and I feel to express a hope that the Children's Corner will grow or expand into a children's paper or magazine, and that the Liberals and Freethinkers will keep alive the Little Freethinker, of which our good "Aunt Elmina" is the editor.

SADIE A. MAGOON.

STAPLETON, S. I., Jan. 28, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav the opportunity I thought I would write you a few lines. While you were on your voyage I missed the letters very much in the Corner, still I was greatly interested with the continued story "Across the Atlantic." I was corresponding with Laura Carlton in Idaho, but as I hav not heard of her for several months I suppose she wishes to drop the correspondence.

Hoping some other girl will write to me, I remain,

Your Liberal Friend,

ELSIE L. SEIDEL.

P.S.—My address is, 112 Broad street,

Stapleton, S. I., N. Y., Box 468. E. S.

KANSAS CITY, KAN., Jan. 26, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My elder brother takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and several other Liberal papers, but I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than the rest on account of the pictures and the Children's department.

I am fourteen years old, and a regular attendant at the Long school, where I am acquiring a good education. The teachers and the principal are all religious, and spend some of our valuable time in singing hymns and repeating the "Lord's prayer," but I notice that a goodly number of the pupils remain ignorant and incorrigible. I think I am about the only Freethinker in the whole school, and of course I hav to bear the slurs of some of the boys and girls whose minds are twisted by superstition. Sometimes I become vexed at them, but reason tells me I should not long remember offenses which spring from ignorance. Sometimes I show them Mr. Heston's cartoons, but generally they are unable to comprehend them.

I hav enjoyed George Remsburg's letters in the Corner, and think I should like to help him dig into some Indian mounds.

When I get a little older I hope to take up the studies of geology and astronomy. I also want to learn all about evolution. I would like to become a scientist, but as I will hav to work for a living I will hav to be satisfied in the rank and file of Freethinkers. I will never be a Christian under any circumstances, because I know the Christians are mistaken about God, the Bible, and several other things, and they will always be behind the times.

When I tell some of the religious people that all the great men nowadays are either Infidel or Liberal in their religious views, they never fail to point with pride to Mr.

Gladstone, of England, and say he is a Christian. I tell them that "it is hard to teach an old dog new tricks," and that Mr. Gladstone sticks to his superstition mostly for the sake of policy.

While such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER are published, I am surprised that the whole world is not converted to Rationalism and common sense.

Your Liberal friend,
ALVIN J. TANNER.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

News of the Week.

In the present Canadian ministry there are seven Catholics.

THAT Cardinal Gibbons visited Blaine while the latter was in his last illness, though once denied by a relative of Blaine, appears true. Blaine, however, was too weak to return a word to the prelate's questions.

CATHOLICS are pleased to receive the news that Senor Montero, of Corunna, Spain, has abjured his tenets antagonistic to them, including his Masonic principles, and publicly been reconciled to their faith. He has discontinued the free non-Catholic school that he formerly supported.

SOME think that our acquisition of Hawaii as a maritime defense may one day be necessary to repel the vast hordes of Chinese, who, though now inert, may some day yield to one of those impulses which have in past ages buried civilization under a wave of barbaric invasion.

THE Russian priest, Johann Cronstadt, is increasing in his reputation as saint and miracle-worker. Crowds press round him so that he has to be protected by the police, and on more than one occasion his garments have been torn to threads by devotees anxious to carry away a rag as a relic.

CARDINAL PAROCCHI has proposed to the pope the erection on Mt. Vanicore, Italy, of a cathedral equal to that of St. Peter's, now the first in the world. The cost, $20,000,000, is to be contributed by Catholics throughout the world. The labor will require fourteen thousand workmen six years.

THE details just received of the attempt of Antichristians in China to murder the Very Rev. Father Hugh, Catholic provincial apostolic, relate that he was stoned till believed dead. "One would have thought," says an account, "that they were killing a mad dog and not a fellow-creature."

LIEUTENANT TOTTEN has resigned from the army, in connection with which he held the position of professor of military science at Yale. He says: "I resigned for the purpose of continuing my work of vindicating the Bible, of establishing Moses and the prophets in the arena of human judgment as more creditable than any history whatsoever."

THE British minister to Turkey has complained to the sultan that that potentate's press censor can no longer be allowed to make editorial changes in the Bible before allowing it in his dominions. The changes were of such a nature as, for instance, the insertion of the word "Christian" before "sinners" in the passage, "Christ came into the world to save sinners."

IN Spain, the Convent of Santa Maria de la Rabida, which was connected with the fortunes of Columbus, has on account of the commemoration been restored to the Franciscan fathers. Its queer name, the Convent of our Lady of the Madness, has attracted attention. This name proceeds from the fact that on the site of the convent formerly stood a cross reputed to cure those bitten by mad dogs—that is, rabid.

ANNEXATION of Canada is being more and more talked of. The three ways in one of which that country is most likely to come to us are: admission at her request, which we should probably grant regardless of a British war; purchase, which, however, is not so likely, as England probably would not sell, and conquest, which of all would be most injudicious, necessitating an endless strife to repress unwilling subjects.

THE 3d inst. was St. Blase's day, observed by the Catholic church with the ceremony of blessing throats. In Catholic churches on this day a special blessing is given to candles, "that all whose throats are touched therewith in pious faith may be freed by the merits of St. Blase's martyrdom from sore throats of any kind." Two candles are lighted, and, placed in the form of a cross, are applied to the throat of the person seeking the blessing, while the priest says: "By the intercession of Blessed Blase, may God free you from sore throat. Amen."

THE controversy over Blaine's religion has caused reference to be made, among other things, to his letter to Rev. James King, in which he said that although political enemies were using against him the assertion that he was a devotee of Catholicism, he would not publicly disavow that faith. His reasons were, first, that he abhorred religious tests in politics, and, second, "because my mother was, as you well know, a Catholic. I would not for a thousand privileges speak a disrespectful word of my mother's religion, and no pressure will draw me into any avowal of hostility or unfriendliness to Catholics."

HAND-BOOK OF FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, $1.25. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.

In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stipendiature; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Gems of Thought.

A GOOD man cares not for the abuse of bad men.—Democritus.

JUSTICE is the virtue of rendering every man his due.—Aristotle.

THE wise man seeks for the cause of his errors in himself; the fool, excusing himself, seeks for it in others.—Confucius.

A MAN who is perpetually conversant with the blessings which reason can bestow seems to be superior to the rest of mankind.—Epicurus.

WE should always act in a way so as to be able to render satisfactory reasons for our conduct. This rule defines almost the extent of our duties.—Cicero.

THE end of philosophy is to subdue the passions, and to qualify us for every condition in life. No event can happen for which the philosopher is not prepared.—Diogenes.

To succor the needy, to protect innocence, to instruct and guide erring humanity; such are the virtues that yield a man satisfaction, and render him useful to his fellow-beings.—Chinese Author.

I FEEL it to be the height of wisdom not to endeavor to oversee yourself, and live a life of prudence and common-sense, but to see over and above myself, entertain sublime conjectures, to make myself the thoroughfare of thrilling thoughts, live all that can be lived.—Thoreau.

THE church firmly believed in the existence of witches and devils and fiends. In this way the church had every enemy within her power. It simply had to charge him with being a wizard, of holding communications with devils, and the ignorant mob were ready to tear him to pieces.—Ingersoll.

THIS is true liberty, when free-born men, having to advise the public, may speak free;

Which he who can, and will, deserves high praise;

Who neither can, nor will, may hold his peace;

What can be juster in a state than this?

—Euripides.

WE have already suggested that there may be a certain historical foundation for the alleged phenomena of demoniacal possession and exorcism, interpreted as the relief of nervous diseases, such as epilepsy or hysteria; and a like germ of actual fact may lie at the basis of other stories of miraculous cure found in the synoptical tradition. The influence of a powerful mind and will over impressionable natures is so frequently illustrated in the affairs of our every-day life that it requires no supernatural hypothesis for its explanation. A trusted physician or nurse often exercises a more potent influence over an invalid than that derived from medicine or the more obvious hygienic appliances. Belief in the curative efficacy of religious rites and priestly manipulations is common among all ignorant peoples, resting, doubtless, on similar, wholly natural, and non-miraculous facts, exaggerated by the imagination. We have only to suppose a like exaggeration, such as universally occurs in the oral transmission even of the reports of ordinary every-day occurrences, to account for the greater number of the alleged miraculous events recorded in the Synoptical Gospels.—Lewis Jones.

IN earlier times it was believed that the earth was a flat surface of moderate extent, roofed over by a solid sky, under which were placed sun, moon, and stars, small orbs designed to give light to the earth around which they revolved. These people believed that all the existing forms of nature were made out of nothing, at the word of a Creator, during six days of evening and morning. They thought that all forms of life were originally made in their existing form complete, whether insect or elephant, grass-blade or oak-tree; and they believed that since the day of creation each species had reproduced its kind without important variation. These theories of the earth and heavens were generally accepted, until Copernicus and Galileo began to influence opinion by calling attention to evidences that the earth was round and that it moved; ideas that were afterward demonstrated by Kepler and Newton. But, although some thinkers suggested other views, the early theory of life remained without serious opposition till the present century, when Lamarck in 1801 formulated, and Darwin in 1858 supported, the theory of EVOLUTION. These writers studied the laws of Evolution as applied to organic life upon the earth; but Herbert Spencer, prior to the publication of Darwin's great work, "The Origin of Species," began to treat of Evolution as the method of the universe, and to apply its doctrines to every department of material and mental existence.—Robt. C. Adams.

THE CHEAPEST GENUINE AMERICAN WATCH EVER SOLD. TIMED, TESTED, AND REGULATED. EVERY WATCH GUARANTEED.

FULLY GUARANTEED TO KEEP ACCURATE TIME.

It is fully as durable as the most expensive watch, and with fair usage will keep good time for Ten Years. This watch is being manufactured in lots of 100,000 at the rate of 1,000 per Day by the largest watch manufacturing concern in the world. This constitutes the sole reason for its low price. It is a practical illustration of what may be done in this country by machinery and skilled operators when an article can be sold in large quantities. Its parts are not made by hand by "Pauper European labor" as are most of the cheap watches now sold, which never run long and can never be repaired. Automatic machinery does everything on this watch and every part is as true as a die can make it. The movement is the same as in all American watches and is readily understood and repaired by any jeweler.

Every Watch Timed, Tested, and Regulated before leaving our hands, and carefully packed with chain.

A FEW TESTIMONIALS FOR YOU TO READ. WE HAVE THEM FROM EVERY STATE.

GENTLEMEN: I am much pleased with the Watch you sent me, and I will say it keeps right up on time. It has not varied any as yet. Most truly yours, WEBB CITY, Jan. 9, 1893. DR. ANDERSON.

GENTLEMEN: I take pleasure in saying the Watch you sent me gave perfect satisfaction. It is a good time-keeper and all you recommend it to be. You will be favored with an order from me soon. Yours truly, CATO, MASS., Jan. 6, 1893. W. G. DONK. LL.

SIRS: I received your Watch and found it to be as represented in the Twentieth Century advertisement. It would be hard to improve on its time-keeping qualities. Yours truly, CALDWELL, Jan. 3, 1893. MOSES HINCHCLIFFE.

R. H. INGERSOLL & BRO., Room 133, 65 Cortlandt street, New York. Kind Sirs: It is a standing rule of mine when I see an admirable trait in any character, or a marked excellence in anything, to express appreciation either in public or in private. Taffy is better than epitaph. Post-mortem praises do the dead no good. The corpse smells no flowers on its casket. Hence I want to say that I am delighted with your Watch—a little gem. I keep it on my typewriter desk during week-days, right before my eyes, and it keeps splendid time. Faithfully yours, FORT WAYNE, IND. STEPHEN A. NORTHBOP.

Canada.

In consideration of what seems to be the approaching annexation of Canada to the United States, lovers of religious liberty must scan with some concern the mischievous condition of Quebec, the Catholic province of that country, in the point of superstition and devotion to church tyrannies.

Just now a conflict is proceeding in that province between the hierarchy and two newspapers, the particulars of which are instructive to us. The Canada Revue, a Montreal journal, and the Echo, a weekly paper published in the county of Deux-Montagnes, in the district of Terrebonne, commented severely on certain clerical scandals which occurred a few weeks ago. They informed the hierarchy that the people were tired of putting up with immoral priests, and recommended it to show greater consideration for the feelings of the laity. Other newspapers dealt with the scandals in a more or less vigorous fashion, but these two deliberately threw away the gloves. Archbishop Fabre, with the approval of Cardinal Taschereau, has consequently put them under the ban of the church. The Echo has ceased publication, but the Revue intends to fight him in the courts. From this kind of ecclesiastical ban, reports a correspondent of the New York Post, a good many journals have died. The Bien Public, which protested against the undue interference by the clergy in elections; the Réveil, which advocated secular education; L'Avenir, which attacked the tithes and clerical domination with the energy of a Paris red; Le Défricheur, edited by Mr. Laurier, now leader of the Liberal party in the Dominion Parliament, who in former days was an extreme Radical—these and others have perished miserably. On the other hand, what the church calls "good" journalists have been rewarded. The editor of Le Courier du Canada received the blessing of Pius IX. for himself and children to the third generation.

In prohibiting his flock from reading the two most outspoken journals, under pain of sin, Monsignor Fabre is acting well within the decrees of the provincial councils of the Roman Catholic church in Quebec. The councils have dealt with what constitutes "good" as well as with what constitutes "bad" journalism. The good journalist possesses some knowledge of les lettres et les sciences, but above all else is an earnest believer in the doctrines of the church. He teaches nothing contrary to those doctrines, excludes every sort of heretical matter from his columns, refuses to insert advertisements of pleasure excursions on Sundays and fête-days, submits himself unqualifiedly to the directions of the sovereign pontiff, and is prepared at all times to listen to the advice and warning of the bishop of the diocese. The bad journalist is, of course, a very different kind of man. Besides doing the forbidden things just enumerated, he shows himself a Liberal in religion, or, what is worse, a downright Atheist; and even when he does not actually sow among his readers the errors condemned in the Syllabus, he has a habit of finding fault with pontifical documents and with the clergy, and of accusing zealous Catholics, lay and clerical, of meddling too much in politics. The clergy are authorized to forbid their flocks from reading or coöperating in the editing, management, printing, publication, and sale of these bad journals. They may find that the journals are teaching things at variance with truth and Catholic doctrines, or that they are animated by a bad spirit; in either case the laity must be prevented from reading them. Colorless journalism, the journalism which, while abstaining from evil as here defined, does not exert itself in the interest of Catholic truth, is also to be denounced, though much will depend on the circumstances of the case.

To illustrate their exact meaning, the ecclesiastics put the case of the imaginary personage Péréjus. Péréjus was a well-to-do man, of excellent character, who desired to live like a good Catholic, and to be looked upon as such. He went to church every day, attended carefully to his religious duties, gave to charities, visited the sick, and so on. But he did not wish to be regarded by his neighbors as a militant Catholic; hence, though he might easily have exerted a wholesome influence upon friends who were in the meshes of Liberalism and other grievous errors, he refrained from doing so on the ground that he wanted to be at peace and to respect the opinions of others. Query: Was Péréjus's conduct proper or blameworthy? The answer of the professor of moral theology, which is commended to the attention of colorless journalists in Quebec, was that Péréjus sinned against charity in not correcting the faults of his friends, and exposed himself to danger in refusing, out of an exaggerated respect for their opinions, to defend and proclaim the truth before the world.

The decrees likewise contain instructions with reference to special cases which may arise when a newspaper has been banned at the tavern of a diocese. For instance, shall a hotel-keeper be allowed to subscribe to a bad journal which has been banned when he sets up the plea that he takes good journals, and that the good ones counteract the mischief wrought by the bad? The answer is that a distinction must be drawn between bad journals. In a mixed community like Quebec it is necessary to display a certain amount of tolerance toward Protestants in order that friendly relations may be maintained. Hence Protestant journals that are not bad ex professo may be taken by a French hotel-keeper, especially if he has Protestant customers. But no journal banned for teaching errors, or for assailing the clergy, may be taken, particularly if it be printed in French.

A few years ago the proprietors of the Revue would not have stood much chance in trying a fall with the archbishop in the courts. Under the decrees and canons a layman who brings a cleric before the civil tribunals on account of anything the cleric may have done in the rightful discharge of his episcopal or sacerdotal functions, is ipso facto guilty of sin; and so are the jury, if Catholics, who may find against the cleric. The recent scandals, however, have disturbed the people, and it is just possible the Revue may recover damages. The case is exciting considerable interest.

From the above particulars upon only one point of the church despotism that oppresses Canada, our readers will perceive that if that country be merged with ours it will take brisk work by lovers of freedom to prevent the setting in of retrograde tendencies in our public management.

One of Christianity's Disgraces.

In the countries of Europe, and to some degree in our own, the detestable persecution of the Jews continues. This inhumanity, taking its rise from the pure myth of the crucifying by that race of the son of God, is not the least of the shames of Christianity.

The persecution is, naturally, the severest in that country which is the most thoroughly Christian, viz., Russia. From that land the latest tidings are that six new edicts have been issued aiming to disperse the Jewish subjects, weaken their position and trading centers, and crush out their religion. These edicts are enforced with the utmost rigor in many parts of the empire and with severity everywhere. Thousands of Jewish working people have been driven from their employment to become beggars and wanderers. Old soldiers, who wore medals for faithful and gallant service in Russia's army, are treated with as little mercy as other Jews. No recognition whatever is given to their claims upon the country. Merchants of the best standing are driven out like the poorest laborer, and not only deprived of their business but robbed of the money that is owing to them, for their debtors, encouraged to injustice by the unjust course of the authorities, refuse to pay the debts, well aware that their Jewish creditors are virtually without remedy.

The Moscow papers boast that since the beginning of 1891 twenty thousand Jews have been converted to orthodoxy. The unhappy converts, who have been driven to a pretended denial of their religious faith in order to escape intolerable persecution, have been deported to the district of Tcherkijova, about five miles from Moscow. There they are rigorously governed by priests of the Russian Orthodox church, who require them to attend the services of that church and to comply with its various rules, watching narrowly for any sign of evasion or repentance. These priests have entire supervision of the wretched colony, and the alleged converts from Judaism are only allowed leave to return to Moscow upon a certificate from the priests certifying that the convert holding such certificate is assured in the faith of the Orthodox church. When thus released from the ordeal of Tcherkijova their troubles are not over. The police and police spies keep a careful watch over them, and if they fail in attention to their religious obligations as members of the Orthodox church they are reported as recanting to the Jewish faith. Should the charge of recantation be established the usual punishment is deportation to Siberia.

The Smolenski station, whence trains start for foreign parts by way of Poland, has been the scene of some of the most painful spectacles. The Moscow correspondent of the London Daily News describes the scene. In the throng at the station there were old men and women upward of eighty years of age, and half-clad little children. All were crying, cursing, or praying. One's heart can but bleed for these victims of that diabolical belief the Christian religion.

In the other European lands the anti-Jewish crusade is waxing in proportions. The correspondent M. Jacques St. Cère believes that it is certain eventually to bring about a revolution. In Austria popular agitations against the Hebrews are frequent. In Germany, on several occasions of late, crowds have passed along the Friederichstrasse crying "Down with the Jews!"

In our own country minor incidents of Jewish persecution now and then appear. In New York city the practice of rowdies of pulling the beards of Jews has been growing since the influx of the latter from Russia. Perhaps a dozen cases of beard-pulling have been heard of here, and two or three of them have been brought before our judges, who, however, have failed to punish the offenders as they deserved. In Shenandoah, Pa., a bitter race war is raging between the Hebrews of the place on the one side and the Hungarians, Lithuanians, and Poles, who constitute a large percentage of the population, on the other. Resolutions were lately passed by the latter rendering any Lithuanian or Pole found patronizing a Hebrew, especially a clothing dealer, amenable to a fine of $3 for each offense. Several thousand copies of a disgraceful circular were then distributed throughout the city, notifying people of the action taken on Sunday. The circular, which is printed in Lithuanian and Polish languages, was headed with an offensive cut. The Hebrews are endeavoring to discover the authors of the circular and the instigators of the attack, with the intention of bringing criminal prosecutions against them.

Such is the working of Christianity. Such are the diabolical feelings and conduct which it breeds from notions utterly ungrounded. Such is the hell which, as if in anticipation of its predicted one hereafter, it ever strives to produce on this earth.

Scientists Investigating Spiritualism.

Several scientists of the highest standing have made an investigation of Spiritualistic phenomena at Milan, Italy. Great interest in their proceedings was felt throughout Europe. Signor Schiaparelli, one of the committee, is an astronomer and the discoverer of the lines on Mars. Professor Brofferio, another of the inquirers, is the winner of the ten-thousand-franc prize offered by the Italian government for the best scientific article of last year.

The majority of the investigators were not believers in Spiritualism; each came with his own theory explaining the phenomena. Schiaparelli was perhaps the only one who had no theory whatever concerning them. He had been told by his friend Zöllner, the astronomer, that there was something true in Spiritualist phenomena; of this Zöllner had become convinced during his researches for proofs of a fourth dimension.

These scientific men met in Milan in September last, and held seventeen sittings, between the hours of nine and twelve in the evening. The medium was Eusapia Paladino, a Neapolitan, whose fame has spread throughout Europe. She is, reports the New York Sun, a robust-looking little woman about twenty-five years of age. She is married. Her husband is a carpenter and she is an ironer. It was discovered when she was quite young that she seemed to possess some strange power. No one could understand what it was. When she was asked what she thought it was she said: "How do I know what it is?" The people of the class to which she belonged ridiculed her; and, as the fatigue of exerting the strange force was very great, she concluded that it was not worth while to exert it. Indeed, she took such an aversion to the mysterious influence that for ten years she never experimented with it. It was only through the insistence of Signor Ercole Chiajia that she was induced to do so again. So, at least, the report runs. Signor Chiajia is a gentleman living in Naples. He has been distinguished by the king, and is a man of means. He could, says our report, hardly be suspected of having dubious motives in bringing Eusapia to the attention of people, especially as she does not give public sittings. His motive has been to call her to the attention of scientists.

When it became known that these sittings were being held in Milan, an editor of one of the daily papers published an article in which he offered to bet three thousand francs that Eusapia was a humbug, and that the phenomena were produced by trickery. He professed to be able to explain the tricks, and declared that she could not produce one of the phenomena under conditions named by him. This journalist explained the phenomena as being cleverly performed by Eusapia changing her hands and feet about in such a way that the two persons holding her believed that they each held a hand and a foot, while they both held the same hand and foot; thus she had the other hand and foot free to work with. The lights he explained as being phosphorus on her fingers. The moving of heavy objects at a distance, the appearance of hands, figures, and the like, he accounted for as being the work of an accomplice. This explanation satisfied the public at large, but seemed to have no effect on the scientific men, who continued their researches. From time to time remarkable things were told of what took place at the sittings.

In the light, tables were tipped, and also lifted wholly into the air, without visible means of propulsion. While this was done the hands of the investigators rested on the table. Photographs of the table suspended in the air were taken. The medium then seated herself in a weighing-scale and at will produced variations in her weight of twenty-five pounds. Next, while at a distance from the scale, she caused it to oscillate up and down. Chairs moved about the room apparently of their own accord.

Under the next condition of complete darkness phenomena occurred which are thus described by the committee:

"The hands and feet of the medium were held by those sitting next her. In this condition of things the most various and singular facts invariably began immediately to present themselves, which, under a full light, we might wish for in vain. Darkness manifestly facilitated these manifestations, which may be classified as follows:

"(1) Raps on the table much stronger than those which we heard beneath or inside the table when it was light.

"(2) Knocks and blows given to the chairs of those nearest the medium, so forcible at times as to turn the chair around, with the person seated in it. At times, the person rising, the chair was taken entirely away.

"(3) Flying through the air of different objects, such as instruments of music; percussion and sounding of the same.

"(4) Elevation upon the table of the body of the medium, together with the chair in which she was seated.

"(5) Apparition of phosphorescent torches of brief duration (a fraction of a second), and of sparks or luminous disks, some millimeters in diameter, which sometimes unfolded.

"(6) The sound of two hands clapping in the air.

"(7) Gusts of air sensibly felt, like light wind localized in a small space.

"(8) Contact of a mysterious hand, either upon the portions of our body which were covered, or on the uncovered portions, such as the hands and face, in which case one experiences precisely the sensation of touch and warmth which a human hand produces.

"(9) Appearance of one and even two hands projected against a phosphorescent background or upon a window slightly illuminated.

"(10) Divers things done by such hands, such as the tying and untying of knots, pencil marks (apparently) left by the same on sheets of paper and in other places, and impressions of such hands on sheets of blackened paper.

"(11) Contact of our hands with a mysterious face, which certainly was not that of the medium.

"Those who deny the possibility of mediumistic phenomena usually explain these facts by the supposition that the medium has the faculty (declared impossible upon the competent authority of Professor Richet) of seeing in the complete obscurity in which we performed these experiments, and that by artifice she succeeded in making both the persons guarding her hold the same hand, thus liberating the other to produce the contact. Those of us who had custody of Eusapia's hands are obliged to confess that she did not conduct herself in a manner to facilitate our work. When an important manifestation was about to take place she began to move about with her whole person, pulling herself away and trying to liberate her hand, as if from a contaminating touch. In order to maintain control, those holding her were obliged to follow every movement of the hand which wished to escape, and repeatedly, for an instant, the contact of her hand was lost exactly at the moment in which it was most desirable that it should have been maintained. Neither was it always easy to assure ourselves whether it was the right hand of the medium which we held or the left one. For that reason many of the numerous manifestations observed in darkness were considered by us of insufficient demonstrative value, while yet being intrinsically probable. We make no report of such experiments, giving only cases where it was not possible to have the least doubt."

Finally, phenomena previously obtained only in darkness were secured while the medium was in light and all the rest of the room about her in darkness.

The committee closes its report with these conclusions:

"1. That, in the circumstances given, none of the manifestations obtained in a more or less intense light could have been produced by any artifice whatever.

"2. That the same conviction can be affirmed in regard to the greater number of the phenomena taking place in darkness.

"For the rest, we recognize that from a strictly scientific point of view our experiments still leave much to be desired. They were undertaken without the possibility of our knowing what we should need, and the instruments and different appliances which we were obliged to use had to be improvised. Nevertheless, that which we have seen and verified is sufficient in our eyes to prove that these phenomena are most worthy of scientific attention. We consider it our duty to express publicly our esteem for and our gratitude to Sig. Ercole Chiajia for having pursued for so many years with such zeal and so much patience, in spite of opposition and protest, the development of the mediumistic faculties of this remarkable subject, calling the attention of the studios to her, having but one object in view, the triumph of an unpopular truth. GIOVANNI SCHIAPARELLI, Director of the Astronomical Observatory, Milan.

"CARL DU PREL, Doctor of Philosophy, Munich.

"ANGELO BROFFERIO, Professor of Physics in the Royal School of Agriculture, Portici.

"G. B. ERMACORA, Doctor of Physics.

"GIORGIO FINZI, Doctor of Physics."

Signor Schiaparelli, being asked by a reporter if he believed in the phenomena, said: "How can I say that I believe a thing which I can account for in no way? I should define the phenomena as mediumistic, and I consider them of great interest to science."

Professor Brofferio said that he thought the way to explain the phenomena collectively, in the easiest and most probable way, was to call them the work of spirits.

We highly approve of these investigations of Spiritualistic phenomena by scientists. This class of men is preëminently the one for the work. The methods of science are certain to give us the truth on this subject, whether that truth be for or against. We expect the facts of the matter to be by blessed and all-solving Science proved to demonstration and beyond possible challenge before many decades pass.

The Evil Exemplars of the Bible.

What are called the great men of the Bible do not always meet at the hands of the world the same reverent treatment they do from the Sunday-school. The free-speaking Dr. Briggs recently gave a very active clapperclawing and mangling to that object of our childhood's veneration, Abraham; and the doctor's views were well disseminated by the press. Now comes the New York Sun and gives Solomon such a character as must amaze many a person who still entertains the conceptions of his youth and pious teaching. A Jewish correspondent of that ruthless sheet asks: "Could a really wise man, such a man as Solomon for example, be elected president of the United States?" The Sun replies that Solomon could not be elected, because in truth he was not a wise man, but wicked and foolish. He would not be an available candidate for any party. If Solomon were living now, and if he pursued the career with which his name is associated, he would have no standing in respectable society. All virtuous Israelites, honest Christians, and square Infidels would wish to vote against him if he were running for high office. He was a man of vicious life, grossly vicious: he oppressed the people, squandered the public funds, governed his country badly, levied taxes in the most reckless way, corrupted society, and violated the Commandments openly, even the Commandment against murder while yet he was a boy. All the facts of his history are given in the Bible. The Sun goes on to declare: "If he were up for president in our times, we should struggle to defeat him. It is true that he built a temple, a palace, and other gorgeous edifices in Jerusalem, but he built them with the blood of his subjects. It is true that he talked very wisely, but he acted most foolishly and wickedly. We would not oppose him because he encouraged the worship of Moloch and other false gods, for in this country a candidate's religious views are not brought up in a presidential campaign; but we should stand out in relentless opposition to him on account of his bad politics and his profligacy. No Solomon for us! The brave yet patient Jews suffered terribly under his yoke, and he left his country in a shocking condition. We therefore tell our Jewish correspondent who wants to know if Solomon would have any chance of election to the presidency, that he would not."

Bravely done, friend Sun. High time it is that the scoundrels who parade in the Bible's licentious pages be cast down from their pedestals of exemplariness, and the emulous view of youth be turned instead upon its fit models of the scientists and humanitarians, upon that which is good and true.

With Our Congressmen.

News and Notes.

On Saturday, February 11th, I pursue my way over the Blue Ridge into the historic Shenandoah valley, around which will ever linger tragic, beautiful, and sublime memories of an immortal struggle.

A hundred miles away from Washington I finish my journey at Luray, Va., and the first thing that greets my eye as I step upon the platform is the blazing badgepin which Otto Wettstein has made familiar to our Freethought ranks; and it did not take more than a glimpse for me to recognize a true and fearless comrade, namely, M. V. Dadisman, the pioneer Liberal of this country. He and his brothers, George and William, are the only outspoken Infidels in this community, and by their united enthusiasm I entered upon a somewhat uncertain campaign. No Freethought lectures had ever been given in this place. There are about eight churches in Luray, with a population of a thousand or fifteen hundred, and these churches exercise a very depressing influence upon the average individual, and it takes uncommon boldness to express an opinion not consistent with the orthodox creed. No hall of any kind could be procured at Luray, nor the use of the courthouse, and I was obliged to give my lectures in the country—two at Leachville, in the old schoolhouse, at present unused, I believe, a new schoolhouse having been built, otherwise I suppose we could not have secured it; and two lectures at Hubbard, in a most ancient meeting-house, and this also was at our service because a new church was for the accommodation of the Christians. Some dreadful rumors were afloat as to what might be the outcome of these Infidel proceedings. Some expected personal violence—rotten eggs at least, if nothing worse. Even those of a Liberal turn remained away, for fear they might be involved in the scrimmage and receive an egg or two from the hands of the excited saints, who whispered all sorts of dire reprisals.

The leading papers of the country refused to advertise the lectures and advised Mr. Dadisman to telegraph me at once not to come. However, we pursued the even tenor of our way, and amidst the rural comforts of the old homestead of the Dadismans I enjoyed an afternoon's rest, and after supper proceeded to the picturesque little old church for the lecture. This church is about a hundred years old, the oldest I have seen for some time, and it was a truly venerable structure. The pulpit was a regular wooden box, the gallery for the colored worshippers was on the two sides, the seats were rude benches, and a big stove stuffed with wood sent out its cheerful heat as about thirty straggled in from the somewhat stormy outside. It was a rather odd experience that I should give my first lecture in Virginia in a church where thousands of sermons have been preached for over a century and saturated every timber with the gospel story. It was a quaint aspect, something like the look of Noah's ark, that greeted my unaccustomed vision. The area was dimly lighted with lanterns, and curious eyes were fixed upon the "new preacher." The Dadisman brothers and their sister, who are excellent singers, made the rafters ring with a Freethought melody, and then I gave a discourse on the Demands of Liberalism, which was received quite favorably. There was not the least disturbance, and at the close of the lecture many declared it was their sentiments exactly.

On Sunday morning I lectured to a fair audience in the Leachville schoolhouse. I was to lecture Sunday evening at Hubbard again, and if the weather had been fair I no doubt should have had a crowded house, for a wide interest was in the community to know more about Freethought. But it began snowing late in the afternoon and by night the air was full of flakes and the ground was white, and the storm was so violent that the lecture was adjourned. It continued snowing until Monday afternoon, when it cleared off and I lectured to a good audience at Leachville on Monday evening, and on Tuesday evening to a much larger gathering than before at Hubbard. In every lecture I was listened to with the most respectful attention, and I am sure that great good has been accomplished in giving these people a correct view of Liberalism. They are ready for it when they see that it is simply common sense and justice. I have enjoyed the campaign, and my uncompromising coadjutors, the Dadisman brothers, have done all they could to aid me in my labors and have won a deserved victory. Through many years they have borne our flag aloft with no support from half-hearted Liberals and with the hostility of churches, but they have never flinched. They have boldly maintained their position, distributed books and papers and agitated and educated the community. M. V. Dadisman, the eldest of the brothers, generously bore the expense of the lectures, and a more earnest supporter I have not met. I could not have had a better companion for my first Virginia campaign.

On Monday I descended into the Luray cave, perhaps, all things considered, the most remarkable cave in the world. It is not so large as the Mammoth cave; it has not the extent of gloom and majesty of space which impress with such grandeur, but the formations of Luray cave are much more magnificent and varied than those of the Mammoth or those of any other cave now known. Chamber succeeds chamber, and as the light flashes over the walls and roofs and dim spaces a most wonderful effect is produced. All colors greet the eye, gorgeous, delicate, like gold, or like the tints of a rich garment, or like the effulgence of a cathedral, or the splendor of a sunset sky. Sometimes we look into a profound abyss, out of which shadowy forms emerge, white and brilliant or gigantic and grotesque. Sometimes the formations are like a frozen cataract—then like a lady's dress, even in the latest style crinoline and all—then like a fluttering veil—then like an elephant, or like a camel traversing the desert—then like a couchant lion or a basket of flowers, a fish-market, a vegetable garden, a hanging sword, statuary, the wings of birds, a stone hand thrust straight from the wall, a mermaid, a bath, a lady's toilet-table, a silvery fountain, an outspread tent, a column, a lady's riding-whip, a handkerchief, a shawl, a blanket, a sleeping infant, a tower, a coffin, a nest with eggs, etc.—all these things can be seen in these numberless formations, where time for a million years has been tracing out these exquisite and superb delineations. We wander through the Giant's Hall—the Ballroom—the vast Cathedral, with its natural organ, and as you touch the daintily colored pipes the most sweet and solemn music rolls through the dim recesses, and by the organ the chimes respond to the touch with the same rhythmic call, and an enormous stalagmite not far away sends forth the deep bass of the drum. So ear is charmed as well as vision in this glorious underworld. We gaze upon the Crystal Springs, clear as diamonds, and through the interminable archways behold the still waters and know not where in the shining chamber ends the limpid tide. We dream by the Fallen Column. Four thousand years ago this column fell, and men of science say that it was seven million of years in its growth. What a pigmy thing Adam is by the side of this mighty column, even in its fall telling a story more wonderful than the Bible tales. Imbedded in the dripstone at the foot of a precipice in Shelton gorge I gaze upon the bones of a man—real bones—and how long they have been there, whence they came, the awful mystery none can tell; but long, long ago some life was ended, solitary, with terror and despair, in this lonely tomb. Earth, with its wild magnificence, held in its grim embrace the creature of light and air from above, but the echo of the story is lost forever in the measureless gloom.

Once more back to the everlasting struggle for human right after drinking deep of nature's pristine glory. How goes the battle? Well, it is something of a drawn battle. The orthodox have not got the advantage altogether, and they shake somewhat in their boots for fear the victory may after all slip from their grasp. It is pretty definitely settled that Congress will take no further action pro or con on this Sunday question. But the fight is not ended, and will not be ended until the World's Fair itself is ended. Congress cannot put it down, and it will rise in still greater vehemence at Chicago. The orthodox party have endeavored to pass more regulations—to make a penalty for Sunday opening. Senator Quay made a rather faint effort in this direction, but was sat down upon by his colleagues. Congress has simply resolved to let things drift and will not enforce any more rigid Sunday restrictions upon the commissioners. Even if the commissioners should open the gates on Sunday I doubt if Congress would do anything to prevent this or to recover appropriations. The public opinion is so evidently in favor of Sunday opening, and the matter has been so thoroughly discussed, that Congress is disposed to let the commissioners open anyway if they have the requisite courage. Congressmen have told me that they wish now they had never meddled with the subject, but that it is too late to remedy the action taken, and they say, "Let the commissioners open. There won't be any trouble about it so far as Congress is concerned." Good lawyers declare that the condition can be interpreted as applying only to government exhibits. This indeed was the understanding of Senator Stewart, who voted for the condition, but is in favor of Sunday opening. It is a nice question as to the legal meaning of the restriction. As there is no penalty attached, it cannot be a law. The very fact that the orthodox party have tried to amend the legislation shows that they realize its looseness and that it is not legally effective. Leading Congressmen have said to me that they expected the Fair would be open on Sunday, and that there was really no need of repeal. A condition with no penalty attached they say is practically no condition at all.

A compromise measure allowing the Fair to be open a half-day on Sunday has been introduced. I do not want this bill to pass, and shall not support it nor present petitions in its favor. I doubt if Congress takes any action on this bill. It would be a shrewd thing for the church to support the bill, for it would practically gain its point and at the same time avoid the almost overwhelming indignation of the people, which is sure to beat against the church if the gates are shut the whole day. By its present policy the church will alienate millions who heretofore have been somewhat friendly to it, not realizing what a harsh master it is, give it the power.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Robert G. Ingersoll.

Abraham Lincoln.

Eighty-four years ago to-day, two babes were born—one in the woods of Kentucky, amid the hardships and poverty of pioneers; one in England, surrounded by wealth and culture. One was educated in the University of Nature, the other at Oxford.

One associated his name with the enfranchisement of labor, with the emancipation of millions, with the salvation of the Republic. He is known to us as Abraham Lincoln.

The other broke the chains of superstition and filled the world with intellectual light, and he is known as Charles Darwin.

Because of these two men the Nineteenth Century is illustrious.

A few men and women make a nation glorious—Shakespeare made England immortal, Voltaire civilized and humanized France, Goethe, Schiller, and Humboldt lifted Germany into the light. Angelo, Raphael, Galileo and Bruno crowned with fadeless laurels the Italian brow, and now the most precious treasure of the Great Republic is the memory of Abraham Lincoln.

Every generation has its heroes, its iconoclasts, its pioneers, its ideals. The people always have been and still are divided, at least into two classes—the many, who with their backs to the sunrise worship the past; and the few, who keep their faces towards the dawn—the many, who are satisfied with the world as it is; the few, who labor and suffer for the future, for those to be, and who seek to rescue the oppressed, to destroy the cruel distinctions of caste, and to civilize mankind.

Yet it sometimes happens that the liberator of one age becomes the oppressor of the next. His reputation becomes so great—he is so revered and worshiped—that his followers, in his name, attack the hero who endeavors to take another step in advance.

The heroes of the Revolution, forgetting the justice for which they fought, put chains upon the limbs of others, and in their names the lovers of liberty were denounced as ingrates and traitors.

In our country there were for many years two great political parties, and each of these parties had conservatives and extremists. The extremists of the Democratic party were in the rear and wished to go back; the extremists of the Republican party were in the front and wished to go forward. The extreme Democrat was willing to destroy the Union for the sake of slavery, and the extreme Republican was willing to destroy the Union for the sake of liberty.

Neither party could succeed without the votes of its extremists.

This was the political situation in 1860.

The extreme Democrats would not vote for Douglas, but the extreme Republicans did vote for Lincoln. Lincoln occupied the middle ground, and was the compromise candidate of his own party. He had lived for many years in the intellectual territory of compromise—in a part of our country settled by Northern and Southern men—where Northern and Southern ideas met, and the ideas of the two sections were brought together and compared.

The sympathies of Lincoln, his ties of kindred, were with the South. His convictions, his sense of justice, and his ideals, were with the North. He knew the horrors of slavery, and he felt the unspeakable ecstasies and glories of freedom. He had the kindness, the gentleness, of true greatness, and he could not have been a master; he had the manhood and independence of true greatness, and he could not have been a slave. He was just, and was incapable of putting a burden upon others that he himself would not willingly bear.

He was merciful and profound, and it was not necessary for him to read the history of the world to know that liberty and slavery could not live in the same nation, or in the same brain. Lincoln was a statesman. And there is this difference between a politician and a statesman. A politician schemes and works in every way to make the people do something for him. The statesman wishes to do something for the people. With him place and power are means to an end, and the end is the good of his country.

The Republic had reached a crisis.

The conflict between liberty and slavery could no longer be delayed. For three-quarters of a century the forces had been gathering for the battle.

After the Revolution, principle was sacrificed for the sake of gain. The Constitution contradicted the Declaration. Liberty as a principle was held in contempt. Slavery took possession of the Government. Slavery made the laws, corrupted courts, dominated presidents and demoralized the people.

In 1840, when Harrison and Van Buren were candidates for the Presidency, the Whigs of Indiana issued a circular giving reasons for the election of Harrison and the defeat of Van Buren. The people of Indiana were advised to vote against Van Buren because he, when a member of the New York Legislature, had voted to enfranchise colored men who had property to the extent of two hundred and fifty dollars. This was the crime of Van Buren.

The reason why the people should support Harrison was that he had signed eleven petitions to make Indiana a slave State.

Mr. Douglas voiced the feeling of the majority when he declared that he did not care whether slavery was voted up or down.

From the heights of philosophy—standing above the contending hosts, above the prejudices, the sentimentalities of the day—Lincoln was great enough and brave enough and wise enough to utter these prophetic words:

A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this Government cannot permanently endure half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved; I do not expect the house to fall; but I do expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all the one thing or the other. Either the opponents of slavery will arrest the further spread of it, and place it where the public mind shall rest in the belief that it is in the course of ultimate extinction, or its advocates will push it further until it becomes alike lawful in all the States, old as well as new, North as well as South.

This declaration was the standard around which gathered the grandest political party the world has ever seen, and this declaration made Lincoln the leader of that vast host.

In this, the first great crisis, Lincoln uttered the victorious truth that made him the foremost man in the Republic.

The people decided at the polls that a house divided against itself could not stand, and that slavery had cursed soul and soil enough.

It is not a common thing to elect a really great man to fill the highest official position. I do not say that the great presidents have been chosen by accident. Probably it would be better to say that they were the favorites of a happy chance.

The average man is afraid of genius. He feels as an awkward man feels in the presence of a sleight-of-hand performer. He admires and suspects. Genius appears to carry too much sail—lacks prudence, has too much courage. The ballast of dullness inspires confidence.

By a happy chance Lincoln was nominated and elected in spite of his fitness—and the patient, gentle, and just and loving man was called upon to bear as great a burden as man has ever borne.

II.

Then came another crisis—the crisis of Secession, and Civil War.

Again Lincoln spoke the deepest feeling and the highest thought of the Nation. In his first message he said:

The central idea of secession is the essence of anarchy.

He also showed conclusively that the North and South, in spite of secession, must remain face to face—that physically they could not separate—that they must have more or less commerce, and that this commerce must be carried on, either between the two sections as friends, or as aliens:

This situation and its consequences he pointed out to absolute perfection in these words:

Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws among other friends?

After having stated fully and fairly the philosophy of the conflict, after having said enough to satisfy any calm and thoughtful mind, he addressed himself to the hearts of America. Probably there are few finer passages in literature than the close of Lincoln's inaugural address:

I am loth to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break, our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battlefield and patriotic grave to every loving heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

These noble, these touching, these pathetic words, were delivered in the presence of rebellion, in the midst of spies and conspirators—surrounded by but few friends, most of whom were unknown, and some of whom were wavering in their fidelity—at a time when secession was arrogant and organized, when patriotism was silent, and when, to quote the expressive words of Lincoln himself, "Sinners were calling the righteous to repentance."

When Lincoln became President, he was held in contempt by the South—underrated by the North and East—not appreciated even by his cabinet—and yet he was not only one of the wisest, but one of the shrewdest of mankind. Knowing that he had the right to enforce the laws of the Union in all parts of the United States and Territories—knowing, as he did, that the secessionists were in the wrong, he also knew that they had sympathizers not only in the North but in other lands.

Consequently he felt that it was of the utmost importance that the South should fire the first shot, should do some act that would solidify the North and gain for us the justification of the civilized world. He so managed affairs that while he was attempting simply to give food to our soldiers, the South commenced hostilities and fired on Sumter.

This course was pursued by Lincoln in spite of the advice of many friends, and yet a wiser thing was never done.

At that time Lincoln appreciated the scope and consequences of the impending conflict. Above all other thoughts in his mind was this:

"This conflict will settle the question, at least for centuries to come, whether man is capable of governing himself, and consequently is of greater importance to the free than to the enslaved."

He knew what depended on the issue and he said:

"We shall nobly save, or meanly lose, the last, best hope of earth."

III.

Then came a crisis in the North.

It became clearer and clearer to Lincoln's mind, day by day, that the rebellion was slavery, and that it was necessary to keep the border States on the side of the Union. For this purpose he proposed a scheme of emancipation and colonization—a scheme by which the owners of slaves should be paid the full value of what they called their "property." He called attention to the fact that he had adhered to the Act of Congress to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes—that the Union must be preserved, and that, therefore, all indispensable means must be employed to that end.

If, in war, a nation has the right to take the property of its citizens—of its friends—certainly it has the right to take the property of those it has the right to kill.

He knew that if the border States agreed to gradual emancipation, and received compensation for their slaves, they would be forever lost to the Confederacy, whether secession succeeded or not. It was objected at the time, by some, that the scheme was far too expensive; but Lincoln, wiser than his advisers—far wiser than his enemies—demonstrated that from an economical point of view, his course was best.

He proposed that $400 be paid for slaves, including men, women, and children. This was a large price, and yet he showed how much cheaper it was to purchase than to carry on the war.

At that time, at the price mentioned, there were about $750,000 worth of slaves in Delaware. The cost of carrying on the war was at least two millions of dollars a day, and for one-third of one day's expenses, all the slaves in Delaware could be purchased. He also showed that all the slaves in Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri could be bought, at the same price, for less than the expense of carrying on the war for eighty-seven days.

This was the wisest thing that could have been proposed, and yet such was the madness of the South, such the indignation of the North, that the advice was unheeded.

Again, in July, 1862, he urged on the Representatives of the border States a scheme of gradual compensated emancipation; but the Representatives were too deaf to hear, too blind to see.

Lincoln always hated slavery, and yet he felt the obligations and duties of his position. In his first message he assured the South that the laws, including the most odious of all—the law for the return of fugitive slaves—would be enforced. The South would not hear. Afterwards he proposed to purchase the slaves of the border States, but the proposition was hardly discussed—hardly heard. Events came thick and fast; theories gave way to facts, and everything was left to force.

The extreme Democrat of the North was fearful that slavery might be destroyed, that the Constitution might be broken, and that Lincoln, after all, could not be trusted; and at the same time the radical Republican feared that Lincoln loved the Union more than he did liberty.

The fact is that he tried to discharge the obligations of his great office, knowing from the first that slavery must perish. The course pursued by Lincoln was so gentle, so kind and persistent, so wise and logical that millions of Northern Democrats sprang to the defense, not only of the Union, but of his administration. Lincoln refused to be led or hurried by Fremont or Hunter, by Greeley or Sumner. From first to last he was the real leader, and he kept step with events.

IV.

THE GREATEST CRISIS.

On the 22d of July, 1862, Lincoln called together his cabinet for the purpose of showing the draft of a Proclamation of Emancipation, stating to them that he did not wish their advice, as he had made up his mind.

After the Proclamation was signed Lincoln held it, waiting for some great victory before giving it to the world, so that it might appear to be the child of strength.

This was on the 22d of July, 1862. On the 22d of August of the same year Lincoln wrote his celebrated letter to Horace Greeley, in which he stated that his object was to save the Union; that he would save it with slavery if he could; that if it was necessary to destroy slavery in order to save the Union, he would; in other words, he would do what was necessary to save the Union.

This letter disheartened, to a great degree, thousands and millions of the friends of freedom. They felt that Mr. Lincoln had not attained the moral high upon which they supposed he stood. And yet, when this letter was written, the Emancipation Proclamation was in his hands, and had been for thirty days, waiting only an opportunity to give it to the world.

Some two weeks after the letter to Greeley, Lincoln was waited on by a committee of clergymen, and was by them informed that it was God's will that he should issue a Proclamation of Emancipation. He replied to them, in substance, that the day of miracles had passed. He also mildly and kindly suggested that if it were God's will this Proclamation should be issued, certainly God would have made known that will to him—to the person whose duty it was to issue it.

On the 22d day of September, 1862, the most glorious date in the history of the Republic, the Proclamation of Emancipation was issued.

Lincoln had reached the generalization of all arguments upon the question of slavery and freedom—a generalization that never has been, and probably never will be, excelled:

In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free.

This is absolutely true. Liberty can be retained, can be enjoyed, only by giving it to others. The spendthrift saves, the miser is prodigal. In the realm of Freedom, waste is husbandry. He who puts chains upon the body of another shackles his own soul. The moment the Proclamation was issued, the cause of the Republic became sacred. From that moment the North fought for the human race. From that moment the North stood under the blue and stars, the flag of Nature—sublime and free.

In 1831 Lincoln saw in New Orleans a colored girl sold at auction. The scene filled his soul with indignation and horror.

Turning to his companion, he said, "Boys, if I ever get a chance to hit slavery, by God I'll hit it hard!"

The helpless girl, unconsciously, had planted in a great heart the seeds of the Proclamation.

Thirty-one years afterwards the chance came, the oath was kept, and to four millions of slaves, of men, women, and children, was restored liberty, the jewel of the soul.

In the history, in the fiction of the world, there is nothing more intensely dramatic than this.

Lincoln held within his brain the grandest truths, and he held them as unconsciously, as easily, as naturally as a waveless pool holds within its stainless breast a thousand stars.

Let us think for one moment of the distance traveled from the first ordinance of secession to the Proclamation of Emancipation.

In 1861 a thirteenth amendment to the Constitution was offered to the South. By this proposed amendment slavery was to be made perpetual. This compromise was refused, and in its stead came the Proclamation. Let us take another step.

In 1865 the thirteenth amendment was adopted. The one proposed made slavery perpetual. The one adopted in 1865 abolished slavery and made the great Republic free forever.

The first state to ratify this amendment was Illinois.

V.

FOREIGN FOES.

We were surrounded by enemies. Many of the so-called great in Europe and England were against us. They hated the Republic, despised our institutions, and sought in many ways to aid the South.

Mr. Gladstone announced that Jefferson Davis had made a nation, and he did not believe the restoration of the American Union by force attainable.

From the Vatican came words of encouragement for the South.

It was declared that the North was fighting for empire and the South for independence.

The Marquis of Salisbury said: "The people of the South are the natural allies of England. The North keeps an opposition shop in the same department of trade as ourselves."

Some of their statesmen declared that the subjugation of the South by the North would be a calamity to the world.

Louis Napoleon was another enemy, and he endeavored to establish a monarchy in Mexico to the end that the great North might be destroyed. But the patience, the uncommon common sense, the statesmanship of Lincoln—in spite of foreign hate and Northern division—triumphed over all. And now we forgive all foes. Victory makes forgiveness easy.

Lincoln was, by nature, a diplomat. He knew the art of sailing against the wind. He had as much shrewdness as is consistent with honesty. He understood, not only the rights of individuals, but of nations. In all his correspondence with other governments he neither wrote nor sanctioned a line which afterwards was used to tie his hands. In the use of perfect English he easily rose above all his advisers and all his fellows.

No one claims that Lincoln did all. He could have done nothing without the great and splendid generals in the field; and the generals could have done nothing without their armies. The praise is due to all—to the private as much as to the officer; to the lowest who did his duty, as much as to the highest.

My heart goes out to the brave private as much as to the leader of the host.

But Lincoln stood at the center and with infinite patience, with consummate skill, with the genius of goodness directed, cheered, consoled, and conquered.

VI.

Slavery was the cause of the war, and slavery was the perpetual stumbling-block. As the war went on question after question arose—questions that could not be answered by theories. Should we hand back the slave to his master, when the master was using his slave to destroy the Union? If the South was right slaves were property, and by the laws of war anything that might be used to the advantage of the enemy might be confiscated by us. Events did not wait for discussion. General Butler denominated the negro as a "contraband." Congress provided that the property of the rebels might be confiscated.

Lincoln moved along this line.

Each step was delayed by Northern division, but every step was taken in the same direction.

First, Lincoln offered to execute every law, including the most infamous of all; second, to buy the slaves of the border states; third, to confiscate the property of rebels; fourth, to treat slaves as contraband of war; fifth, to use slaves for the purpose of putting down the rebellion; sixth, to arm these slaves and clothe them in the uniform of the Republic; seventh, to make them citizens, and allow them to stand on an equality with their white brethren under the flag of the Republic.

During all these years, Lincoln moved with the people—with the masses, and every step he took has been justified by the considerate judgment of mankind.

VII.

Lincoln not only watched the war, but kept his hand on the political pulse. In 1863 a tide set in against the administration. A Republican meeting was to be held in Springfield, Illinois, and Lincoln wrote a letter to be read at this convention. It was in his happiest vein. It was a perfect defense of his administration, including the Proclamation of Emancipation. Among other things he said:

But the proclamation, as law, either is valid or it is not valid. If it is not valid it needs no retraction, but if it is valid it cannot be retracted, any more than the dead can be brought to life.

To the Northern Democrats who said they would not fight for negroes, Lincoln replied:

Some of them seem willing for you—but no matter.

Of negro soldiers:

But negroes, like other people, set upon motives. Why should they do anything for us if we will do nothing for them? If they stake their lives for us they must be prompted by the strongest motive—even the promise of freedom. And the promise, being made, must be kept.

There is one line in this letter that will give it immortality.

The Father of waters again goes unweary to the sea.

This line is worthy of Shakespeare.

Another:

Among freemen there can be no successful appeal from the ballot to the bullet.

He draws a comparison between the white men against us and the black men for us:

And then there will be some black men who can remember that with silent tongue and clenched teeth and steady eye and well-poised bayonet they have helped mankind on to this great consummation; while I fear there will be some white ones unable to forget that with malignant heart and deceitful speech they strove to hinder it.

Under the influence of this letter, the love of country, of the Union, and above all the love of liberty, took possession of the heroic North.

The Republican party became the noblest organization the world has ever seen.

There was the greatest moral exaltation ever known.

The spirit of liberty took possession of the people. The masses became sublime.

To fight for yourself is good.

To fight for others is grand.

To fight for your country is noble.

To fight for the human race—for the liberty of hand and brain—is nobler still.

As a matter of fact the defenders of slavery had sown the seeds of their own defeat. They dug the pit in which they fell. Clay and Webster and thousands of others, had by their eloquence made the Union almost sacred. The Union was the very tree of life, the source and stream and sea of liberty and law.

For the sake of slavery millions stood by the Union, for the sake of liberty millions knelt at the altar of the Union; and this love of the Union is what, at last, overwhelmed the Confederate hosts.

It does not seem possible that only a few years ago our Constitution, our laws, our Courts, the Pulpit and the Press defended and upheld the institution of slavery—that it was a crime to feed the hungry—to give water to the lips of thirst—shelter to a woman flying from the whip and chain!

The old flag still flies—the stars are there—the stains have gone.

VIII.

Lincoln always saw the end. He was unmoved by the storms and currents of the times. He advanced too rapidly for the conservative politicians, too slowly for the radical enthusiasts. He occupied the line of safety, and held by his personality—by the force of his great character, by his charming candor—the masses on his side.

The soldiers thought of him as a father.

All who had lost their sons in battle felt that they had his sympathy—felt that his face was as sad as theirs. They knew that Lincoln was actuated by one motive, and that his energies were bent to the attainment of one end—the salvation of the Republic.

Success produces envy, and envy often ends in conspiracy.

In 1864 many politicians united against him. It is not for me to criticise their motives or their actions. It is enough to say that the magnanimity of Lincoln towards those who had deserted and endeavored to destroy him, is without parallel in the political history of the world. This magnanimity made his success not only possible, but certain.

During all the years of war Lincoln stood, the embodiment of mercy, between discipline and death. He pitied the imprisoned and condemned. He took the unfortunate in his arms, and was the friend even of the convict. He knew temptation's strength—the weakness of the will—and how in fury's sudden flame the judgment drops the scales, and passion—blind and deaf—usurps the throne.

Through all the years Lincoln will be known as Lincoln the Loving, Lincoln the Merciful.

Lincoln had the keenest sense of humor, and always saw the laughable side even of disaster. In his humor there was logic and the best of sense. No matter how complicated the question, or how embarrassing the situation, his humor furnished an answer, and a door of escape.

Vallandigham was a friend of the South, and did what he could to sow the seeds of failure. In his opinion everything, except rebellion, was unconstitutional.

He was arrested, convicted by a court martial, and sentenced to imprisonment in Fort Warren.

There was doubt about the legality of the trial, and thousands in the North denounced the whole proceedings as tyrannical and infamous. At the same time millions demanded that Vallandigham should be punished.

Lincoln's humor came to the rescue. He disapproved of the findings of the court, changed the punishment, and ordered that Mr. Vallandigham should be sent to his friends in the South.

Those who regarded the act as unconstitutional almost forgave it for the sake of its humor.

Horace Greeley always had the idea that he was greatly superior to Lincoln, and for a long time he insisted that the people of the North and the people of the South desired peace. He took it upon himself to lecture Lincoln, and felt that he in some way was responsible for the conduct of the war. Lincoln, with that wonderful sense of humor, united with shrewdness and profound wisdom, told Greeley that, if the South really wanted peace, he (Lincoln) desired the same thing, and was doing all he could to bring it about. Greeley insisted that a commissioner should be appointed, with authority to negotiate with the representatives of the Confederacy. This was Lincoln's opportunity. He authorized Greeley to act as such commissioner. The great editor felt that he was caught. For a time he hesitated, but finally went, and found that the Southern commissioners were willing to take into consideration any offers of peace that Lincoln might make. The failure of Greeley was humiliating, and the position in which he was left absurd.

Again the humor of Lincoln had triumphed.

Lincoln always tried to do things in the easiest way. He did not waste his strength. He was not particular about moving along straight lines. He did not tunnel the mountains. He was willing to go around, and he reached the end desired as a river reaches the sea.

IX.

One of the most wonderful things ever done by Lincoln was the promotion of General Hooker. After the battle of Fredericksburg, General Burnside found great fault with Hooker, and wished to have him removed from the Army of the Potomac. Lincoln disapproved of Burnside's order, and gave Hooker the command of the Army of the Potomac. He then wrote Hooker this memorable letter:

I have placed you at the head of the Army of the Potomac. Of course I have done this upon what appears to me to be sufficient reasons, and yet I think it best for you to know that there are some things in regard to which I am not quite satisfied with you. I believe you to be a brave and skillful soldier—which, of course, I like. I also believe you do not mix politics with your profession—in which you are right. You have confidence—which is a valuable, if not an indispensable, quality. You are ambitious, which, within reasonable bounds, does good rather than harm; but I think that during General Burnside's command of the army you have taken counsel of your ambition to thwart him as much as you could—in which you did a great wrong to the country and to a most meritorious and honorable brother officer. I have heard, in such a way as to believe it, of your recently saying that both the army and the Government needed a dictator. Of course it was not for this, but in spite of it, that I have given you command. Only those generals who gain successes can set up dictators. What I now ask of you is military successes, and I will risk the dictatorship. The Government will support you to the best of its ability, which is neither more nor less than it has done and will do for all commanders. I much fear that the spirit which you have aided to infuse into the army, of criticising their commander and withholding confidence in him, will now turn upon you. I shall assist you, so far as I can, to put it down. Neither you, nor Napoleon, if he were alive, can get any good out of an army while such a spirit prevails in it. And now beware of rashness. Beware of rashness, but with energy and sleepless vigilance go forward and give us victories.

This letter has,—in my judgment, no parallel. The mistaken magnanimity is almost equal to the prophecy:

I much fear that the spirit which you have aided to infuse into the army of criticising their commander and withholding confidence in him, will now turn upon you.

Chancellorsville was the fulfillment.

X.

Mr. Lincoln was a statesman.

The great stumbling-block—the great obstruction—in Lincoln's way, and in the way of thousands, was the old doctrine of States Rights.

This doctrine was first established to protect slavery. It was clung to to protect the inter-State slave trade. It became sacred in connection with the Fugitive Slave Law, and it was finally used as the corner-stone of Secession.

This doctrine was never appealed to in defense of the right—always in support of the wrong. For many years politicians upon both sides of these questions endeavored to express the exact relations existing between the Federal Government and the States, and I know of no one who succeeded, except Lincoln. In his message of 1861, delivered on July the 4th, the definition is given, and it is perfect:

Whatever concerns the whole should be confined to the whole—to the General Government. Whatever concerns only the State should be left exclusively to the State.

When that definition is realized in practice, this country becomes a Nation. Then we shall know that the first allegiance of the citizen is not to his State, but to the Republic, and that the first duty of the Republic is to protect the citizen, not only when in other lands, but at home, and that this duty cannot be discharged by delegating it to the States.

Lincoln believed in the sovereignty of the people—in the supremacy of the Nation—in the territorial integrity of the Republic.

XI.

A great actor can be known only when he has assumed the principal character in a great drama. Possibly the greatest actors have never appeared, and it may be that the greatest soldiers have lived the lives of perfect peace. Lincoln assumed the leading part in the greatest drama ever acted upon the stage of a continent.

His criticism of military movements, his correspondence with his generals and others on the conduct of the war, show that he was at all times master of the situation—that he was a natural strategist, that he appreciated the difficulties and advantages of every kind, and that in "the still and mental" field of war he stood the peer of any man beneath the flag.

Had McClellan followed his advice, he would have taken Richmond.

Had Hooker acted in accordance with his suggestions, Chancellorsville would have been a victory for the Nation.

Lincoln's political prophecies were all fulfilled.

We know now that he not only stood at the top, but that he occupied the center, from the first to the last, and that he did this by reason of his intelligence, his humor, his philosophy, his courage and his patriotism.

In passion's storm he stood unmoved, patient, just and candid. In his brain there was no cloud, and in his heart no hate. He longed to save the South as well as the North, to see the Nation one and free.

He lived until the end was known.

He lived until the Confederacy was dead—until Lee surrendered, until Davis fled, until the doors of Libby Prison were opened, until the Republic was supreme.

He lived until Lincoln and Liberty were united forever.

He lived to cross the desert—to reach the palms of victory—to hear the murmured music of the welcome waves.

He lived until all loyal hearts were his—until the history of his deeds made music in the soul of men—until he knew that on Columbia's Calendar of worth and fame his name stood first.

He lived until there remained nothing for him to do as great as he had done.

What he did was worth living for, worth dying for.

He lived until he stood in the midst of universal Joy, beneath the outstretched wings of Peace—the foremost man in all the world.

And then the horror came. Night fell on noon. The Savior of the Republic, the breaker of chains, the liberator of millions, he who had "assured freedom to the free," was dead.

Upon his brow Fame placed the immortal wreath.

For the first time in the history of the world a Nation bowed and wept.

The memory of Lincoln is the strongest, tenderest tie that binds all hearts together now, and holds all States beneath a Nation's flag.

XII.

Strange mingling of mirth and tears, of the tragic and grotesque, of cap and crown, of Socrates and Democritus, of Æsop and Marcus Aurelius, of all that is gentle and just, humorous and honest, merciful, wise, laughable, lovable and divine, and all consecrated to the use of man; while through all, and over all, were an overwhelming sense of obligation, of chivalric loyalty to truth, and upon all, the shadow of the tragic end.

Nearly all the great historic characters are impossible monsters, disproportioned by flattery, or by calumny deformed. We know nothing of their peculiarities, or nothing but their peculiarities. About these oaks there clings none of the earth of humanity.

Washington is now only a steel engraving. About the real man who lived and loved and hated and schemed, we know but little. The glass through which we look at him is of such high magnifying power that the features are exceedingly indistinct.

Hundreds of people are now engaged in smoothing out the lines of Lincoln's face—forcing all features to the common mould—so that he may be known, not as he really was, but, according to their poor standard, as he should have been.

Lincoln was not a type. He stands alone—no ancestors, no fellows, and no successors.

He had the advantage of living in a new country, of social equality, of personal freedom, of seeing in the horizon of his future the perpetual star of hope. He preserved his individuality and his self-respect. He knew and mingled with men of every kind; and, after all, men are the best books. He became acquainted with the ambitions and hopes of the heart, the means used to accomplish ends, the springs of action and the seeds of thought. He was familiar with nature, with actual things, with common facts. He loved and appreciated the poem of the year, the drama of the seasons.

In a new country a man must possess at least three virtues—honesty, courage and generosity. In cultivated society, cultivation is often more important than soil. A well-executed counterfeit passes more readily than a blurred genuine. It is necessary only to observe the unwritten laws of society—to be honest enough to keep out of prison, and generous enough to subscribe in public—where the subscription can be defended as an investment.

In a new country, character is essential; in the old, reputation is sufficient. In the new they find what a man really is; in the old, he generally passes for what he resembles. People separated only by distance are much nearer together than those divided by the walls of caste.

It is no advantage to live in a great city, where poverty degrades and failure brings despair. The fields are lovelier than paved streets, and the great forests than walls of brick. Oaks and elms are more poetic than steeples and chimneys.

In the country is the idea of home. There you see the rising and setting sun; you become acquainted with the stars and clouds. The constellations are your friends. You hear the rain on the roof and listen to the rhythmic sighing of the winds. You are thrilled by the resurrection called Spring, touched and saddened by Autumn—the grace and poetry of death. Every field is a picture, a landscape; every landscape a poem; every flower a tender thought, and every forest a fairyland. In the country you preserve your identity—your personality. There you are an aggregation of atoms; but in the city you are only an atom of an aggregation.

In the country you keep your cheek close to the breast of Nature. You are calmed and ennobled by the space, the amplitude and scope of earth and sky—by the constancy of the stars.

Lincoln never finished his education. To the night of his death he was a pupil, a learner, an inquirer, a seeker after knowledge. You have no idea how many men are spoiled by what is called education. For the most part, colleges are places where pebbles are polished and diamonds are dimmed. If Shakespeare had graduated at Oxford, he might have been a quibbling attorney, or a hypocritical parson.

Lincoln was a great lawyer. There is nothing shrewder in the world than intelligent honesty. Perfect candor is sword and shield.

He understood the nature of man. As a lawyer he endeavored to get at the truth, at the very heart of a case. He was not willing even to deceive himself. No matter what his interest said, what his passion demanded, he was great enough to find the truth and strong enough to pronounce judgment against his own desires.

Lincoln was a many-sided man, acquainted with smiles and tears, complex in brain, single in heart, direct as light; and his words, candid as mirrors, gave the perfect image of his thought. He was never afraid to ask—never too dignified to admit that he did not know. No man had keener wit, or kinder humor.

It may be that humor is the pilot of reason. People without humor drift unconsciously into absurdity. Humor sees the other side—stands in the mind like a spectator, a good-natured critic, and gives its opinion before judgment is reached. Humor goes with good nature, and good nature is the climate of reason. In anger, reason abdicates and malice extinguishes the torch. Such was the humor of Lincoln that he could tell even unpleasant truths as charmingly as most men can tell the things we wish to hear.

He was not solemn. Solemnity is a mask worn by ignorance and hypocrisy—it is the preface, prologue, and index to the cunning or the stupid.

He was natural in his life and thought—master of the story-teller's art, in illustration apt, in application perfect, liberal in speech, shocking Pharisees and prudes, using any word that wit could dis-infect.

He was a logician. His logic shed light. In its presence the obscure became luminous, and the most complex and intricate political and metaphysical knots seemed to untie themselves. Logic is the necessary product of intelligence and sincerity.

It cannot be learned. It is the child of a clear head and a good heart.

Lincoln was candid, and with candor often deceived the deceitful. He had intellect without arrogance, genius without pride, and religion without cant—that is to say, without bigotry and without deceit.

He was an orator—clear, sincere, natural. He did not pretend. He did not say what he thought others thought, but what he thought.

If you wish to be sublime you must be natural—you must keep close to the grass. You must sit by the fireside of the heart: above the clouds it is too cold. You must be simple in your speech: too much polish suggests insincerity.

The great orator idealizes the real, transfigures the common, makes even the inanimate throb and thrill, fills the gallery of the imagination with statues and pictures perfect in form and color, brings to light the gold hoarded by memory the miser, shows the glittering coin to the spendthrift hope, enriches the brain, ennobles the heart, and quickens the conscience. Between his lips words bud and blossom.

If you wish to know the difference between an orator and an elocutionist—between what is felt and what is said—between what the heart and brain can do together and what the brain can do alone—read Lincoln's wondrous speech at Gettysburg, and then the speech of Edward Everett.

The oration of Lincoln will never be forgotten. It will live until languages are dead and lips are dust. The speech of Everett will never be read.

The elocutionists believe in the virtue of voice, the sublimity of syntax, the majesty of long sentences, and the genius of gesture.

The orator loves the real, the simple, the natural. He places the thought above all. He knows that the greatest ideas should be expressed in the shortest words—that the greatest statues need the least drapery.

Lincoln was an immense personality—firm but not obstinate. Obstinate is egotism—firmness, heroism. He influenced others without effort, unconsciously; and they submitted to him as men submit to nature—unconsciously. He was severe with himself, and for that reason lenient with others.

He appeared to apologize for being kinder than his fellows.

He did merciful things as stealthily as others committed crimes.

Almost ashamed of tenderness, he said and did the noblest words and deeds with that charming confusion, that awkwardness, that is the perfect grace of modesty.

As a noble man wishing to pay a small debt to a poor neighbor, reluctantly offers a hundred-dollar bill and asks for change, fearing that he may be suspected either of making a display of wealth or a pretense of payment, so Lincoln hesitated to show his wealth of goodness, even to the best he knew.

A great man stooping, not wishing to make his fellows feel that they were small or mean.

By his candor, by his kindness, by his perfect freedom from restraint, by saying what he thought, and saying it absolutely in his own way, he made it not only possible, but popular, to be natural. He was the enemy of mock solemnity, of the stupidly respectable, of the cold and formal.

He wore no official robes either on his body or his soul. He never pretended to be more or less, or other, or different, from what he really was.

He had the unconscious naturalness of Nature's self.

He built upon the rock. The foundation was secure and broad. The structure was a pyramid, narrowing as it rose. Through days and nights of sorrow, through years of grief and pain, with unswerving purpose, "with malice towards none, with charity for all," with infinite patience, with unclouded vision, he hoped and toiled. Stone after stone was laid, until at last the Proclamation found its place. On that the goddess stands.

He knew others, because perfectly acquainted with himself. He cared nothing for place, but everything for principle; nothing for money, but everything for independence. Where no principle was involved, easily swayed—willing to go slowly, if in the right direction—sometimes willing to stop; but he would not go back, and he would not go wrong.

He was willing to wait. He knew that the event was not waiting, and that fate was not the fool of chance. He knew that slavery had defenders, but no defense, and that they who attack the right must wound themselves.

He was neither tyrant nor slave. He neither knelt nor scorned.

With him, men were neither great nor small—they were right or wrong.

Through manners, clothes, titles, rags and race he saw the real—that which is. Beyond accident, policy, compromise and war he saw the end.

He was patient as Destiny, whose undecipherable hieroglyphs were so deeply graven on his sad and tragic face.

Nothing discloses real character like the use of power. It is easy for the weak to be gentle. Most people can bear adversity. But if you wish to know what a man really is, give him power. This is the supreme test. It is the glory of Lincoln that, having almost absolute power, he never abused it, except on the side of mercy.

Wealth could not purchase, power could not awe, this divine, this loving man.

He knew no fear except the fear of doing wrong. Hating slavery, pitying the master—seeking to conquer, not persons, but prejudices—he was the embodiment of the self-denial, the courage, the hope, and the nobility of a Nation.

He spoke not to inflame, not to upbraid, but to convince.

He raised his hands, not to strike, but in benediction.

He longed to pardon.

He loved to see the pearls of joy on the cheeks of a wife whose husband he had rescued from death.

Lincoln was the grandest figure of the fiercest civil war. He is the gentlest memory of our world.

Synopsis of the Credo.

Of things unknown 'tis claimed we need,
With priest and church, a sacred creed,
To tell us how the world was made,
And why the walls of hell were laid;
How man was made, and how he fell—
Just how the snake made Eve rebel
And pluck the fruit all love so well;
To teach us what we must believe
About a devil and Adam and Eve;
To let us know, what no one knows,
Where after death the sinner goes;
And in the morn of eternity,
How 'twas decreed that a deity
Should come through some virginity,
And stand on earth and dwell with man,
A few to save, the rest to damn;
How came the God in nick of time
And proved his claim by many a sign:
Turned pure water to festal wine,
On two small fishes some thousands fed,
And cast out devils and raised the dead—
This king of the New Jerusalem,
This scion traced to old David's stem;
And how in sorrows the earth he trod,
This singular, this plural God—
One equal three, three equal one—
A Christian puzzle for Christians dumb!
How on a cross he suffered death,
And sacrificed his godly breath;
How rose from tomb and went somewhere
To sit and listen to Christian prayer;
How again will come with angel host,
This Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
The elect to judge in heaven to dwell,
The reprobates with the devil in hell.

This is the creed the priest hath made,
Our mites to get, and make afraid;
We may not ask the why or wherefore:
"Thus saith the Lord," he shouts, and therefore We must believe and chip the cash in,
Or suffer an eternal thrashing.
Of things unknown a creed is made
To fortify a priestly trade.
O shame on the priest who knows that we know
The lies that he tells he knows are not so!

A Card from R. B. Westbrook.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot reply to Mr. Samuel P. Putnam directly and preserve my self-respect, in view of the ungentlemanly epithets he applies to me. He has placed himself outside of the limits of honorable controversy. I am not "the foe of human liberty." I am not in favor of "brute force." I am not "with the tyrant." I am not guilty of "damnable orthodoxy." I am not "in favor of chains and slavery." I am not a "despot at heart." I am not the kind of Liberal that Mr. Samuel P. Putnam is. It would be easy to show the falsity of his so-called syllogistic conclusion, from a false premise, but while he shows such an absolute disregard for truth, I must leave him to his vulgar ravings. I wish him no harm. He is his own worst enemy.

R. B. WESTBROOK.

Legal Fours and Legal Days.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Mr. Putnam has well answered Dr. Westbrook on most points raised by the latter, and I imagine that the ex-president of the Secular Union will not find it an easy task to demonstrate to Freethinkers the alleged compatibility of Sabbath laws and "Liberalism." But there is one paragraph in the reverend gentleman's article that calls for a few words from me. These are the lines:

If it be proper to number the hours of labor it is proper to number the days of labor. If we have the right to say that eight hours shall be a day's work, we have a right to say that six days shall constitute a week's work.

Let us make a little further use of the Westbrookian logic.

If it is proper to number the hours and the days of labor, it is proper to number the years of labor. If we have the right to say that eight hours shall be a day's work and that six days shall constitute a week's work, we have a right to say that nine years shall be devoted to labor and the tenth year to idleness.

Mr. Westbrook has assumed the legitimacy of one piece of indefensible meddlesomeness and then made this justify another. So reasoning, any man can make out a case for any tyrant and cause any usurpation to appear plausible and harmless.

If Mr. Westbrook chooses to work eight or ten or fifteen hours per day neither Mr. Putnam nor I, neither the state of Pennsylvania nor the United States government, have any warrant to interfere with him. If it is his pleasure to labor two or six or seven days each week neither of the persons or powers named has any business to punish him for his choice.

All this talk about a law-enforced day of rest is rot. It makes no difference to the person fined or imprisoned whether the theft of labor-fruits or the alienation of liberty is accomplished in the name of "religion" or "physiology." What idea of Liberalism can a man have who would fine or jail his neighbor for attending to his own affairs in a strictly non-invasive manner? Does Dr. Westbrook imagine that he is better qualified than Mr. Putnam to decide how many hours or days of work are beneficent to the latter?

Darwin on Christianity.

"I never gave up Christianity until I was forty years of age," said Charles Darwin to Dr. Ludwig Büchner and Edward B. Aveling, in 1881. And on further inquiry as to why he abandoned Christianity he said: "It is not supported by evidence."—A tract, by Edward Aveling, London, 1884.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG recently gave a lecture at Caddo, in the Choctaw Nation. In a review of the lecture, the Caddo Banner says: "The lecture at the court-house on the evening of the 8th inst., by the eminent J. E. Remsburg, on 'False Claims' of the church, was, perhaps, one of the most scholarly as well as masterly discourses ever delivered in Caddo on any subject. The lecturer proved himself a thorough scholar and investigator, a sound and logical reasoner, and an eloquent speaker—presenting his subject in such a manner that carried conviction to every unprejudiced mind present. The evidence produced in support of his position was so strong, so clear—his conclusions so just—that none could question the truth of what he advocated. He has the happy faculty of presenting his subject in such a pleasing and gentlemanly manner that none could become offended though they might differ with him. And while his object was to expose the false claims of the church, and while he was very severe in his strictures on the policy of the church as an organized body, yet there was not one word said that could possibly have offended the feelings of the most devout church-member."

J. E. REMSBURG's appointments, after leaving Washington, will be as follows:

Greensburg, Pa., Feb.	23	Vera Cruz, O., Mar.	4
Butler, Pa., " "	24	Bluffton, O., " "	5

We Do Not Know.

An Infidel of the Deepest Dye.

RENO, NEV., Feb. 4, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6 for the works named. I live in a community in which there are a great many Liberals, but we are like all the people in the state of Nevada, no two of us ever acting in concert.

If we could have an organization of some sort we could do much good. I think we would have a membership of one hundred in a short time, but the people here are afraid to speak their thoughts. I am not only a Liberal but an Infidel without one redeeming feature. I have met people who were unbelievers, yet were shocked at being called Infidels.

According to Webster an Infidel is one who rejects the scriptures, so I do not see what is so odious about the name.

Let every unbeliever come out in his true colors, and not be ashamed to own his belief, and we will soon have unity in the ranks, so that when we go to the polls four years hence we can cast a solid vote for that grand Infidel, patriot, soldier, and statesman, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

A prominent lawyer in this place once said to me, "You are an Infidel because you are ashamed to acknowledge Christianity." I replied that I wished there were ten million more who were ashamed of Christianity, because the world would be better without it.

Still, I know it takes more courage to be an Infidel than it does to be a Christian.

I hope the good work will continue until our country is free from superstition.

A. F. DERRICK.

The Church Has Declared War On Liberty.

SILVERTON, COL., Jan. 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Fanaticism and hypocrisy are gaining a victory which will cost them more than they can ever regain, by opening the eyes of every intelligent man to the wolf in the Christian lamb's hide. The World's Fair to be closed on Sunday by a power claiming not only to be man's best friend here, but to provide for him in a mythical hereafter, cash in advance!

And now these sanctified agents of Heavenly Real Estate (the New Jerusalem, the oldest known boom town) will thank their three Gods for what they have obtained, not through prayer and fasting, but through fraudulent petitions and threats to boycott.

St. Elliot F. Shepard, of the "one glass of whisky" fame, said that the arguments of the advocates of Sunday opening were not entitled to respect on account of their not being "blessed by religion." He meant that they were unanswerable by any narrow-minded bigot who is cursed by the superstitions of the past, dragged through the blood of innocence and intelligence, and that men of his stamp are the kind that history blushes to mention, as they are and always have been clogs on the wheels of progress.

On the other hand, Mayor Washburne made a speech that was a masterpiece of sound logic untainted by any narrow-minded bigotry, and was a credit not only to Chicago but to the whole country.

Prior to this great exposure of the church's power in this country, the Liberals saw little necessity of organizing, but now that they have been beaten by lack of organization as much as anything else, they should hesitate no longer. The church has declared war on Liberty. Let every man accept it as a personal challenge, and fanaticism will more than regret its temporary victory. F. F.

Religion Can Teach Only Revenge and Savagery.

PARIS, TEX., Feb. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I never see any account in your paper of what is going on in this southern part of our Lord's vineyard. I thought I would give a hint of just one incident. On the 1st inst. a man in this city was run and caught, tied and staked, tortured and burnt. Burnt? Yes, burnt to death by his avengers for a very atrocious crime which he had committed. Among the ten thousand people present were priests, parsons, ministers, deacons, in fact, every disciple of Christ, all exultantly rejoicing, mocking, and reviling. Bad example for Christians in this high state of civilization. Now, there were a few Freethought men in one corner of this large concourse of people who did not believe in human torture, sacrifice, slavery, etc., and would have rather seen the poor, ignorant form of humanity turned over to the sheriff and dealt with according to the laws of the state.

A religion that claims for its author blood and tyranny and eternal damnation could not be expected to bring anything but such deplorable results. I believe a good Freethought lecture in this town would be of great benefit.

Those who love justice, truth, and liberty, and who have at the heart the elevation and happiness of the human race, should be free to expose the errors which surround them.

The more I read THE TRUTH SEEKER the better I like it. Mr. Heston's cartoons alone are well worth the subscription.

Yours for Freethought,

JACK SMITH.

God or Nature.

KENT, O., Jan. 29, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: While I am much interested in the articles on God and creation by Otto Wettstein and A. Augusta Chapman, yet neither reveals what I wish to know. They seem to differ in but one thing, and that is what name to give the author of creation. One calls it "God," the other "Nature," and it matters not which name we use, as both seem endowed with the same attributes. They agree that creation was not created, but is still "on the way" via evolution—which destroys the "infinity" of both God and Nature. The word "God" sounds no better to me than "Nature," unless it can be shown to have a higher and "superior" meaning, and if God is the author of nature, he certainly can be no better than nature, to cause or allow nature to smother her "happy smiles" with "frowns of sorrow." It matters not which of the twain spreads the carpet of green at our feet in springtime, for the same covers our bleaching bones with the hoary frosts of winter. Neither God nor Nature seems worthy of our adoration, for "under every blossom there is a lurking sting," and we can only reap the joys of the good and shun the sorrows of the bad. What I wish to know is, have they seen Jahveh or "Old Nick" in their intellectual travels? If so, which is the more to be feared? Must I become a devotee of God for the little good I see in his works, or worship Satan to avoid his wrath in the future? I do not care to follow the examples of most Christians, to worship God but serve the devil. A. D. SWAN.

Priests Rage Because They Are Spoiled Children.

VERA CRUZ, MO., Jan. 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I am weak in finance and ability, but strong in disposition, hence I write to give the names of a few who I think will be liable to become subscribers to your fearless exponent of liberty and justice, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hate shams, impositions, and injustices as dealt out by a set of tyrants known as priests and preachers who fly into a rage of condemnation (like a spoiled child who has always had its own way) every time they meet with anything that does not agree with their all-wise course or notions and fill their pockets with the filthy lucre so needful for the manufacture of idiots and persecutors. I think it is the duty of every man, woman, or child who has sense enough to see the pious-covered infamies practiced under that sheep's coat of religion to do all that is possible to be done to expose it and down it and put a better and more universal mode of justice and decency in the place of it. I long to see the time when honest, deep-thinking men can express their thoughts without being condemned and abused by a set of superstitious, ranting idiots who have neither decency nor honor enough to own the truth if they were capable of seeing it.

When truth abounds philosophers rejoice. But when superstitious error holds the sway it is forced upon the world as a beacon-light of truth by designing men and its infamy made popular through the use of prejudice, brute force, or a majority vote from the credulous many who never think for themselves but follow the old bell-wether of their gang with fear and trembling and dare not move unless he sanctions it. The Old Mother Grundy of church bigotry is their law and gospel. S. B. DAVIS.

Mexicans Starved by Priests.

BISBEE, ARIZ., Jan. 18, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to your esteemed letter of the 31st ult., I would say that nothing would give me more pleasure than to be a constant member of your family; but as a true Liberal I have denied myself this pleasure for over five years, to gratify the wishes and happiness of one other, and during this five years I have added two to my family, and I am confident that we will, all four of us, come in THE TRUTH SEEKER circle in the future. And if you do not find it too monotonous to read, I will tell you of an incident that happened about two months ago. This, the town Bisbee, is, as you probably well know, a mining town on the frontier of Arizona, only about ten miles from the border of old Mexico. And here are a great number of Mexicans employed, and you will know that they are all Catholics. Prominent among them are the Irish, the leaders. And while the field is not great enough for a priest to come here and take up his residence, one made arrangement here last spring to build a church, by begging money for the same from everyone, and now he comes in here regularly from his residence in Tombstone, about the 10th of every month—that is, pay-day—and robs this people, that is, the Mexicans, out of their small earnings. And consequently they have to live in dug-outs, or wicky-ups made out of brush, and in great poverty; and the only thing they have in plenty is children, and they run about half naked. Well, it was on a cold day in the latter part of October. My little girl, Lillian, had been out on the road and had seen a small number of these unfortunate children plating through the mud barefooted, shivering with cold. She came in. I was sitting looking over a newspaper. She went over to her mamma, who was getting supper ready, and said, "Mamma, why did God make Mexicans?" Well, mamma, my dear, good wife, was baffled, and could not give a satisfactory answer, and I told my wife to be on the lookout for more questions like that after a while. N. ERICKSON.

Freethought and Religion in Rogers.

ROGERS, ARK., Dec. 26, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: The "Gem of the Ozarks" is eleven years old and has about two thousand inhabitants. Its being on the Ozark range, having pure soft water distributed by the water-works, the Electric springs near at hand, and the altitude giving a much cooler climate than the lowlands of the state, all conspire to make this a health resort, while our people are trying to make it a manufacturing and an educational center. There have always been a few Freethinkers in or near Rogers, and while they have met the usual opposition they have been treated as kindly as could be expected.

The Seventh Day Adventists held a camp-meeting here in 1889. Their neatly kept grounds, the order and system maintained, produced a favorable impression, while the boldness of their attack on Sunday as the Sabbath caused quite a stir. The camp-meeting was followed by a course of lectures by Rev. Mr. Henderson, who did not neglect the Sabbath question. After he had gone the pulpits "rang with wrath divine."

In February, 1890, J. E. Remsburg lectured on the Sunday question. The Opera House was full, and the interest great. On his return trip from Texas Remsburg lectured on "The Fathers of Our Country." Here he met Rev. Mr. Akers and arrangements were made for a four nights' debate on the inspiration of the Bible. Mr. Akers was a man of more than average ability as a minister, yet because he admitted that there were seeming contradictions in the Bible that he could not understand or explain he lost his position as minister in charge of the Christian church at this place. Some of the members were very indignant.

W. F. Jamieson was here in 1891, but other matters were too pressing to get many out.

On May 24, 1892, the debate between Hall and Remsburg commenced. The Baptists were here in great force. The Opera House was crowded five days and five nights. Hall is a forcible speaker, keen and unscrupulous. He undertook to ride over Remsburg rough-shod. But his tactics did not work. Remsburg, calm and deliberate, stood by his guns and won the respect of the very elect. Good Christians came to the debate fully expecting a wrangle, or perhaps a fight, and when the meeting closed with good feeling prevailing they were disappointed. They hardly knew what to do. Some are very kind personally, but hire vagrants to give us "L" from "coward's castle." They announce large numbers of souls saved, occasionally. If these announcements are true our souls are all saved, or some have been saved several times.

The present outlook is favorable.

Rev. Mr. Penn, the evangelist, has been holding forth some two weeks, commencing about the 1st of December. His accessions were not large, and Christians seem to be ashamed of his methods. This indicates a great change. If Liberals would only come out square for their cause, the contest would be short. Will they do it? My opinion is, we will have it to do or be snowed under.

Respectfully, H. M. MCGAUGHEY.

A Future Life.

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: When we combat the Christian's theory of a future state, we are met with the question, "You take away our hope, but what have you to give us instead?" Those who have built up a belief on an eternity of existence are slow to give it up. Life is sweet, and many still cling to the hope of its continuance after they begin to doubt the truth of the Bible. They have so schooled their minds to accept superstition in place of reason that they prefer a theory that contains something of a supernatural or mysterious nature. When they are brought to know that the Bible is unreliable they are pleased if some opportunity is given to retain a belief in some kind of future existence. Spiritualism supplies that want, and to my mind that is the secret of the partial success that is for the time meeting with. Spiritualists are no doubt doing some good in opening the eyes of deluded Christians to a partial appreciation of the light of reason and common sense. From the dizzy heights of Christian fanaticism to the solid terra firma of Infidelity is a great tumble, and the distance holds many a skeptical person back. Spiritualism provides one of the stopping-places on the way where the seeker after truth can rest awhile and get familiar with the first lesson in mental freedom—that the Bible is not all true. When he has learned this lesson well, he will soon know that holy Bible is holy humbug. It is a pity that teachers of Spiritualism do not teach their doctrines for the good there is in them rather than for the money they can make out of it. I attended a Spiritualist meeting at Howard's Hall, St. Louis, Mo., last Sunday. The sermon was followed by "Tests by a Dr. Stanley." I understand Mr. Stanley has rooms in the city where he gives seances. "Calls up spirits from the vasty deep," as it were, and sells the information he gets from them for a consideration. His object in giving the tests at the meeting was to advertise himself, in fact, he announced from "de preach box," as he called the pulpit, the location of his rooms; that he would be in attendance every afternoon during the week to deliver messages from spirit-land to all applicants at the price of $1 per message. In giving the tests he claimed to be controlled by the spirit of a squaw, and from the silly broken dialect he used, I caught the idea that he wished his audience to believe it was the squaw who talked to us through him. I have spent many years in the wilds of America, and am familiar with nearly every tribe of Indians. I know, as a race, they are ignorant and stupid. If Dr. Stanley's squaw was a fair average Indian in intelligence when in the flesh, and he represented her fairly to the audience last Sunday, then certainly her standard of intelligence has not been improved, and she has very materially retrograded in her language, since her departure from earth. Upon the whole the tests were the gauziest kind of nonsense, and ought not to have been permitted by the people who controlled the meeting. The greatest thing in man is mind, and so far as Spiritualism teaches that it is right to think with perfect freedom, so far it is entitled to the thanks and support of all who love liberty. Men like Dr. Stanley can only injure Spiritualism, and the great number of his kind who are clinging to it will soon prove its destruction. W. WINTER.

Lively Correspondence of a Christian and an Infidel.

GILLESPIEVILLE, O., Jan. 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of January 7th, was an article from my feeble pen, and the outgrowth of it is, I have received some fifteen letters from as many different states, penned by just as many cranks. They mostly agree in calling me villain. Another name for gentleman, I suppose. I will insert the most loving letter here, and my answer follows. Here is the letter:

HORNELLVILLE, N. Y., Jan. 9, 1893.

JAS. P. CRYDER, Dear Sir: A friend handed me THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 7th, and I have read it through and have seen your article. I am a Christian, and try to aid in its promulgation, but I believe that missionary work should be done where the unbeliever is. I have singled you out from the names of the "wanderers" found in that sheet; because I think I understand your peculiarities; for I am, as you will see, a philosopher. My decision in your case is, that you are a nervous, impulsiv, misguided sinner.

In conclusion of your article you try to be funny, of course. I can see by your article that you are ambitious beyond your ability, and, consequently, have pity for you instead of censure. You see that I am your friend, and as such I want to instruct you in the true way to find light. I have done a great deal of good in missionary work in my days, and have saved a good many worse sinners than you; for they were responsible for their misdeeds. My advice to you, my erring friend, is, to "believe and be baptized and be saved," as the Bible tells you. Never attempt to argue the truth or falsity of the Bible with anyone; for that is dangerous ground for any believer, for, as the Bible says, God's ways are not man's ways, and the sensible man knows that he is not capable to reason on God's methods. If you will give him (God) a chance he will tell you the true way to light, and, my unfortunate friend, he tells no untruths. In conclusion I will tell you how God told me the way to my salvation, so you can see that I know what I am talking about. I married my first wife, a Baptist, and one part of the understanding with her was, I was to be one after we were married. She was human, and by her imprudence became mixed up in a serious church scandal, was the cause of a divorce, a good many indignities, and a black eye. I tried to retaliate on my wife, to do presumptuous things with the sisters, but God was with me, and I made a failure; got my mouth slapped by the sister, my eye blackened by her husband, and the other eye opened to the true light by God. I made peace with my wife, joined the true Methodist church, and since then I do not think a churchful of the most licentious clergymen could make my wife untruthful to the Ten Commandments.

A. BERTRAN.

P.S.—If I can do any further good, address on postal card and inclose stamp. No. 8 Elizabeth street, Hornellsville, N. Y.

"A nervous, impulsiv, misguided sinner." Nervous I am not. I do not know what it means of myself. "I am fair, forty, and fat." Impulsiv I am in the cause of truth and justice. Misguided I was when I listened to the teachings of the "sky-pilots," but now I am guided in the ways of truth by the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

"Try to be funny." Did it seem funny to you, Mr. B.? No? Then why think I tried to be funny? If I tried to be funny and was funny, where is the disgrace? If I was not funny you cannot accuse me of trying to be. I am a poor man, and cannot afford to correspond with cranks unless they furnish the stamps. He says, "You are ambitious." Brutus and Cassius said Cæsar was ambitious, and they were "honorable men," and so may my correspondent be; but I doubt it. A dog is known by his company, and this one got into bad company when he joined the Methodist church.

I am ambitious, and he knew by seeing my name in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I had the ambition to get into proper company. But that is not the top round in the ladder of my ambition.

"Your ambition is beyond your ability." Very probable. The top round in the ladder of my ambition is, to embowel the mythological tri-headed God my correspondent so ignorantly worships. Is this ambition beyond my ability? It may be, but I will add my stab to the many already inflicted by greater minds than mine.

He says, "I have pity for you instead of censure." I care not for his pity or his censure. Either is like the tree which bore it, as he is like the God he worships, and that God is a God without honor, without principle, a stranger to justice or mercy or truth, a tyrant, a fiend, and a double-dyed monster.

"I have done a great deal of good in my days." Self-praise, like scandal, is half a lie. "I have done a great deal of good." Doesn't that sound like the arrogance of the meek and lowly Moses, when he says (if the books ascribed to him were written by him, which of course they were not), "And Moses was the meekest man on all the face of the earth?" And, too, it breathes the air peculiar to the bigoted, assumptiv, arrogant Christian of the day. "I have done a great deal of good." Well, I would let some one else tell it.

"I have saved a great many sinners worse than you." Jesus said: "I am the door. He that entereth by another way is a thief and a robber."

"For they were more responsible." Is that true? Is it possible that one man is more responsible to his maker than another? If this be true, then, if both are lost and eternally damned, the one who is least responsible will receive the same unjust punishment the one of greater responsibility receives. This, then, is another example of the impartial justice and mercy of his infernal God.

"Believe, be baptized, and be saved, as the Bible teaches you." Be saved from what, pray? I have no apprehension whatever of being lost. Do you think, Mr. Macdonald, that he meant for me to believe so I might escape hell? Well, let me tell him and all others whom it may concern, I don't want to escape hell! Voltaire is there, is he not? And Volney, and Goethe, and Byron, and Shelley, and Paine, and Franklin, and Lincoln are all there, are they not? And Ingersoll, and Putnam, and Charlesworth, and Helen Gardner, and Miss Wixon, and Mrs. Besant, etc., will all be sure to go to hell, will they not? Well, then, I would not fail to get there for all the bauble of a heaven the God of Moses could offer.

And another thing, I am sure in such company as the above named, hell will be cooler than heaven, with such a batch of hypocrits, thieves, whoremongers, and blathering bitches as heaven will be filled with.

"God's ways are not man's ways." No, thanks be to evolution. In the slums of our great cities you cannot find a being so depraved as he. In the years ago he it was different. The creators of God made him in their own image, and thus they made him vile, ignorant, brutal, and in short, a monstrosity. Neither man, devil, or God, but a conglomeration of all, but that which is good. The old patriarch, Abraham, was much like him. One of the most atrocious crimes conceivable old Abraham was in the act of perpetrating, to murder his own son, in cold blood and premeditation to take that life which in no manner had harmed him; and the great Jehovah reckoned it as righteousness. And the great Jehovah must have thought it a beautiful thing; for in a few years after we see him doing the very same act. He isn't about to do it, but he actually does the horrid deed. Crucifies his only begotten son, one whom he loved. I am glad he doesn't love me. Still the God of our day is better than he was a few hundred years ago. He is growing more civilized, more enlightened. He has taken to study the sciences, has learned a little in astronomy. He formerly thought the sun flew around the earth in twenty-four hours, and he thought the sun, moon, and stars were all made for the benefit of this little planet. He thought the earth was flat, and burnt Galileo at the stake for disputing with him upon the subject. He thought everything was created for the benefit of this world, and this world and all that pertaineth thereto was made for none other than the holy Jew. But our advanced ideas have caused the scales to fall from his eyes in part, and he sees, if he wishes to remain sovereign of the universe, that he will have to be a better behaved God in the future than he has been in the past.

"If you will let God alone, he will tell you the true way to light." If he did I would not believe him, for, you know, a liar cannot be believed although he speak the truth. Look through his holy (?) word and there you will find he is a falsifier and a perjurer. He did not keep his word; he broke his contracts, violated his covenant, and when he swore to do a thing he failed to perform it.

In order to get his wife my correspondent was to join the Baptist church. I may not be responsible, as he says, but I have never seen that woman yet whom I would sacrifice my birthright (my reason) to get. I am a married man, but I entered the marriage bond with reason untrammelled. I hold myself free to express my convictions, as my wife is free to express hers. We are both Liberals, but not of the same degree. She worships at the shrine of Voltaire, while I bow to Paine.

Again he says his wife was human. Well, I have never doubted it, I am sure. Who ever accused him of lying with a beast? She became too intimate with the minister. I don't doubt it in the least. What could be more natural? It is of every-day occurrence. And this he advances to prove his wife was human. Why, bless his pusillanimous soul, I don't care whether she was human or not, or whether he had any wife. "Get thee behind me Satan, thou art an offense unto me."

Then it seemed he tried his hand at the game the preacher played, got his mouth slapped (good), his eye blacked (better), and the other eye opened (best) to the light.

And when he had his eye opened, what did he do? He gave one blink, batted it shut again, and went it blind as before. Left the Baptist church and joined the Methodist. "Jumped from the frying-pan into the fire." "A devilish change indeed," as Burns says. "I don't believe a church full of the most licentious clergymen could make my wife untrue to the Ten Commandments." If the clergy could not make her untrue to them nothing else in heaven or earth could. But if she is true to them she is more than human, more than God. The Christian's God did not keep the Commandments. He said in his word, "Thou shalt not lie," yet he did, and he taught his followers to do the same. He sent Moses to Pharaoh with a lie in his mouth, and he also sent lying spirits to his prophets. "Thou shalt not kill," yet he killed, and commanded his chosen people to murder. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife," yet David, a man after God's own heart, coveted Uriah's wife, and murdered Uriah to cover his tracks. "Thou shalt not commit adultery," yet his mighty ebony wing overshadowed a betrothed damsel, and she became with child. "Thou shalt not steal," yet he taught the Jews to borrow with no intention of returning that which was borrowed.

There was not a single command which he kept unless it was this: "Thou shalt have no other God besides me." "Thou shalt bow down to no graven images." But we have no evidence that he did not bow down to Baal. It is likely he did. If he did it made him no better and it is certain it could have made him no worse, for a bad egg is hard to addle.

In conclusion, let me say, if A. B., or anyone else in Christendom, wishes to criticize this article, let him send his criticism to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if he deems it worthy a reply, and he wishes one from my pen, he will forward the criticism to me and I will gladly respond at my earliest convenience.

Since writing the above I have received another letter from Jesus alive, acknowledging the authorship of the former letter. In his first letter he used a Bible name, in the last he used a Shakspearean name. In his last he called me a villain, a coward, and a disgrace to humanity. And my pen is too dull to tell how mean I did feel. I didn't feel quite as mean as a Christian, but very near it. And you will never know how scared I was. I am "scared" of that "feller," for "he is wondrous brave." I remain,

Yours to defend the truth,

JAMES POE CRYDER.

Encounters With the Enemy.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 25, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER still holds its reputation as the best free-thought paper published in the whole world. At least, that is my opinion.

I am still having plenty of amusement with the clergy of our city. Last April the Episcopalian minister preached an Easter sermon on the resurrection of Jesus, in which he made the statement that it was a great consolation to every believing Christian that God in his infinit goodness had condescended to give such an abundance of historical proof in support of this, the chief cornerstone of the Christian's faith and hope—proof that no skeptic or unbeliever could evade or set aside. After reading his sermon, which was published in one of our daily papers, I wrote to the reverend rector, C. H. Channer, and requested him to be kind enough to furnish me with the historical proof of the resurrection of Jesus, as I had never been able to find anything of the kind outside of the New Testament. In a few days the Rev. Mr. Channer called at my house to talk the matter over. He came fully prepared to floor me on the spot, for he brought with him his bishop from Detroit, Davies. They came armed with abundance of proof, as they supposed, to prove that I was wrong. And what was my surprise, when they presented their so-called proof, to find it nothing but the forged passage in Josephus. I soon disposed of that, as well as all the other proofs they presented. I think they left a little wiser than when they came. I gave each of them a copy of Bierbower's "Was Christ Crucified?" with an earnest request to read it and report. No report yet.

The churches of our city are at the present time holding a union revival meeting, and the writer of this received a very polite invitation to attend. I accepted the invitation for one meeting, and went to hear Rev. Mr. Wilson Whitney, of the First Baptist church. The reverend took his text from Rom. xviii, 1: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers." His sermon was a plea for God in the Constitution, a Christian nation, God in government. I answered his sermon, and showed from the Bible how God had governed his own chosen people when he was their supreme ruler and king—that he frequently sold his chosen people into slavery to the heathen tribes, and destroyed them by the hundreds of thousands, for the awful crime of preferring other gods to him; that he often repented of choosing them for his pets. I showed that God made a miserable failure in governing his own people—and was it at all likely that he would be any more successful in ruling this great American nation? The reverend gentleman, as strange as it may seem, answered this communication, and I wrote a long reply to this squib. But he has not responded, nor do I believe he will.

Yours fraternally, P. B. REASONER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Dare To Be True.

BY SUSAN H. WIXON.

Dare to be true, whatever your station.
No matter what your name or your nation.
Undaunted and fearless, and every thought
Your earnest conviction, honestly wrought.

Dare to be true, though the fierce scorners rail,
And your brave conduct revile and assail;
Let the scoffers scoff, and the haters hate,
Be steadfast and firm, whatever your fate.

Dare to be true—all unshackled and free,
Unfettered and bold on land and on sea;
Determined ne'er to let blinding error
Inspire with dread, or fill you with terror.

Dare to be true, wheresoever you are,
Though the curse comes bitter, near and afar;
Though fair-weather friends are far away fled,
And unthinking mortals would you were dead.

Dare to be true, and mark strictly your way
By the truth's steady light, day after day;
Safely 'twill lead you all dark dangers past,
And happiness here on earth 'twill forecast.

Dare to be true, though public opinion
Would make you a cringing, slavish minion;
Would, as it rattles its numberless seals,
Crush out your life with its juggernaut wheels.

Dare to be true! Let no blinding passion
Lead you astray, or give you occasion
To blush for yourself, or weep bitter tears
Because of a stain on your ripening years.

Dare to be true! Never let clanking chain
Hold you its victim for greed or for gain;
For Freedom and Right your banner unfurl,
All forms of oppression away to hurl.

Dare to be true! In this great world of ours,
Where deceit and falsehood mark many hours;
Where thousands of cowards constantly rise,
The true, honest soul is the one that we prize.

Dare to be true, both in word and in deed,
Let love for humanity be your creed!
Be true to yourself, whether young or old,
For the wealth of truth is better than gold.

Dare to be true, and forever obey
The spirit within that leads not astray;
To nobody bow for praise or for pelf,
But, aim to be always King of Yourself.

A Convention of Young Freethinkers.

DEAR MISS WIXON AND READERS OF THE CORNER: A few leisure moments afford me the blessed opportunity of chatting with you all once more. I see that many new faces are constantly entering the galaxy of our Corner. We welcome you all, and Miss Wixon is, no doubt, proud of her noble young army of Freethinkers. I am proud of you all, and oh, how I wish we could meet some day and have a glorious time! We could call the occasion "the convention of young Freethinkers." We could select Colonel Ingersoll, Miss Wixon, and others who are the friends of the young, to speak for us; and it would be a good idea for all the young Freethinkers to prepare a declamation, an essay, a song, or a short address, and assist in making an interesting program. Why cannot we have a convention? Such an affair would, if properly managed, be a credit to the cause of Freethought.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, it seems to me, could not be improved upon; it is a perfect specimen of journalism. I enjoy reading Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes," they are so interesting, and are couched in such vivid and flowery language. I like his style. There is so much sentiment in his writings, and he is so eloquent. I consider his "Glory of Infidelity" one of the grandest Freethought discourses ever uttered, and one never tires of reading his "Religious Experience;" it is interesting from the first page to the last. Mr. Charlesworth's letters are also interesting, and I am glad that he is having such good success in the lecture field. He is an able and courageous young man, and he deserves the support of the Freethinkers of this country. All honor to him.

The Rev. Dr. Talmage in a recent sermon says: "Do you know the name of the biggest giant that you can possibly meet—and you will meet him? He is not eleven feet high, but one hundred feet high. His head is as long as the continent. His name is Doubt. His common food is Infidel looks and skeptical lectures, and ministers who do not know whether the Bible is inspired at all or inspired in spots, and Christians who are more Infidel than Christian. You will never reach the Promised Land unless you slay that giant. Kill Doubt or Doubt will kill you. How to overcome this giant? Pray for faith, go with people who have faith, read everything that encourages faith, avoid as you would ship fever and small-pox the people who lack faith."

This reverend gentleman uttered the truth when he made the above statement. Infidel books are the food of Doubt in one sense; for no one can read such Infidel books as those of Paine, Voltaire, Bennett, Ingersoll, Seaver, Saladin, and many others without experiencing a doubt as to the divinity and inspiration of the Christian religion. Skeptical lectures bear the same results. Probably many who listened to Colonel Ingersoll on "Myth and Miracle," at Cincinnati recently, went away impressed with the great orator's logical dissertation and with a doubt in their minds as to the truth of the religion of "myth and miracle." This being so, they are now, in all probability, investigating the matter, and paving the way to an ultimate rejection of the dogmas of Christianity. Thus it will be seen, Infidel books and skeptical lectures lead to doubt, doubt leads to investigation, and investigation leads to knowledge. Mr. Talmage speaks of "ministers who do not know whether the Bible is inspired at all, or inspired in spots," when at the same time he is one of these ministers himself, for one minister knows no more about the inspiration of the Bible than another.

My letter is getting rather lengthy, so I will close with best wishes to you all.

Always your friend,

Oak Mills, Kan. GEO. E. REMSBURG.

[The above was received some time ago, but was mislaid, and has just come to light.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

ROCKVILLE, IDA., Jan. 23, 1893.

MISS S. H. WIXON: This is the second time I ever wrote to the Corner, so I thought I would drop you a few lines. I have been writing to Edwin Friend. I would like some of the little boys of the Corner to write to me. I am twelve years old. I had a book and three cards for Christmas. I live on a farm in a low valley about ten miles from the nearest post-office. My father is very lame in the back. I cannot think of much to write, so I will close for this time.

From your Liberal friend,

CHARLES CALVIN CARLTON.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Jan. 30, 1893.

MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. Although I am but twelve years old I am a firm believer in Freethought. Grandpa Bushnell has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a great many years. He presented me with a year's subscription of the same for my birthday, which was very acceptable. I have neither brother nor sister, but have a pleasant home and a great many pleasant associates. Trusting I may be as honorable, honest, and upright as my Liberal grandpa, I remain,

A friend of the Freethinkers,

COLIE INGLIS.

ROCKVILLE, IDA., Jan. 23, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have written to the Corner before, but I like to read the Corner. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would like for the boys and girls to write to me. I got a doll and three cards for Christmas, and my mother and father had a cup and saucer. We have "The Story Hour," and it is a very nice book. I am ten years old. The snow is not very deep here; it is very deep there? I have a brother William, a brother Charles, and a brother Oliver, a sister Laura, and another brother, Robert Ingersoll Carlton. I write to a boy, and his name is Edwin Friend, and I like to write to him. Excuse bad writing and mistakes for this time. I will close, hoping to see my letter in the Corner.

From your Freethinker friend,

ROSE ALICE CARLTON.

ROCKVILLE, IDA., Jan. 23, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner for the second time. I am writing to two girls, one of them is Alice Moss and the other is Elsie Seidel. There are not many Freethinkers around here. They have been having prayer-meeting here all winter except lately. I am almost fourteen years old. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time. We have "The Story Hour," and the Bible Picture Book, and the "Pictorial Text-Book." My smallest brother's name is Robert Ingersoll Carlton, and we think a great deal of him.

I would like for some of the girls and boys to write to me. Please excuse mistakes. If this letter escapes the wastebasket I will try and write again.

From your Liberal friend,

LAURA CARLTON.

DRESDEN, IND., Feb. 1, 1893.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: This is my first attempt to write a letter to the Corner although my father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I can remember. I like to read the paper, and always turn to the Corner first. There are several Freethinkers around here, but some are afraid to say so. The Methodists are talking of commencing church here soon, but I think it of no use, for they have now all the converts they can take care of. I will never join any church and be tied down to their superstitious beliefs.

I go to school and am having a good time. I have a good teacher. We have just finished our examination. I think I made a good grade in most of the branches. Our teacher does not read the Bible or pray in school. I go to church and Sunday-school, but do not believe anything in them. I will close for fear of the wastebasket.

Your Freethinker friend,

LAURA ASHCRAFT.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1893.

MISS WIXON: In the Humanitarian for this month, edited by Mrs. Victoria Woodhull-Martin, Mrs. Zula Maud Woodhull, and Miss Carrie Miles, appears an article under the title of "The Women of China," which is very interesting. In China women are treated worse than slaves. To give you an idea allow me to quote the following:

"If a child strikes his father and that father does not kill him on the spot, then the authorities will take that child and not only consign it to ignominious death, but to slow and awful torture. But if a boy should strike his mother the father would look on with a sort of pride."

"There is a missionary founding asylum in Canton, China, with not a boy baby in it."

"In Foochow there is to be seen this sign on the banks of the river: 'Do not drown female infants here.'"

All those who murder females, abuse their mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters, are nothing else but whitewashed Chinese or Africans, no matter their present nationality or religion. They are all brothers of Moses, sons of the celestial dragon—in one word, they are celestials.

The New York Herald of this morning in giving an account of the trial yesterday of captains and inspectors of the police department of this city says that Inspector Williams asked Superintendent Byrnes, "Can gambling be suppressed in New York?" "No," replied Mr. Byrnes with emphasis. "It can be regulated, but never suppressed." I will close with this remark: When females govern this country, as they will, gamblers, drunkards, etc., will hear another story.

Apollonius of Tyana

IDENTIFIED AS THE

CHRISTIAN JESUS

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed. Price, 15 cents.

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 333 pages. This is, beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly colored, and richly tinted the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published works, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fiske, Eliza Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," Love, Liberty, Art and Morality, Science, Nature, The Imagination, Decoration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny, "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual Liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

Prices.—In cloth, beveled boards, gilt edges, $2.50; in half morocco, gilt edges, $5; in half calf, mottled edges, library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible finish, $9.

HAND-BOOK OF FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, $1.25. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

2 " Prayer.	6 " Hell.
10 " The Creeds.	7 " Miscellaneous.
1 " Christians and Mohammedans.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter absurdity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

GOVERNMENT ANALYZED.

By COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

Contents: Derivations and Definitions of Political Terms; Various Forms of Government; General Principles of Government; Functions of Government; Origin of Government; Declaration of Independence; Articles of Confederation; Defects of the Confederation; Formation of the Constitution of the United States; Taxation; Tariff for Protection; War; Punishment; Marriage; Religion; Prohibition; Money; What a Government Should Be.

Those who know Col. Kelso's keen analytical power, as shown in his "Bible Analyzed" and "Deity Analyzed," will realize that in "Government Analyzed" they will have the bedrock of human authority exposed, and will learn what government is. Whether they will agree with his statement of what government is depends upon whether they lean to Socialistic or Anarchistic philosophy. But at all events everyone can learn something from this book.

BOOKS

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.
Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."
In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.
In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin.
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Contingency even more ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.

Gems of Thought.

THE knowledge of the truth is a man's highest attainment.—Cicero.

WE had better blame our own faults than those of others.—Democritus.

LIBERTY is the greatest good and the foundation of all the rest.—Diogenes.

THERE are no miracles in nature, except for those who have not sufficiently studied her.—D'Holbach.

SINCERITY of heart is the first of virtues; nothing is so indispensable in the commerce of society as sincerity.—Confucius.

IN the eyes of science all miracles are alike, they are the outcome of an ill-regulated fancy, combined with an utter ignorance of the laws of Nature.—Buchner.

EVERY sacred book, successively, has been accepted in the faith that it was to be the final resting-place of the sojourning soul; but after all, it was but a caravansary which supplied refreshment to the traveler, and directed him farther on his way.—Thoreau.

THERE is nothing in this world too sacred to be investigated, to be understood. The philosopher does not hide. Secrecy is not the friend of truth. No man should be reverent at the expense of his reason. Nothing should be worshiped until the reason has been convinced that it is worthy of worship.—Ingersoll.

WHEN we say that pleasure is the sovereign good, enjoyment the chief end of life, we are far from meaning the pleasure, or rather indulgence, of voluptuousness, or those which consist in gross, excessive, and pernicious gratifications, as some have maliciously represented, for it is not riot and dissipation, nor the other consuming excitements of the senses, which render life really pleasant, but it is the sober exercise of reason.—Epicurus.

THIS is what [we] aim at—to teach the importance of attention to a known earth, rather than to an unknown heaven, to uphold the motto, "One world at a time," and to instruct people that the ills of life are to be cured by natural means, not by supernatural remedies. Instead of saying "Earth has no sorrows that heaven cannot heal," we should say, "Earth evils can be cured by earth knowledge." Ignorance is the source of all evil, and as man becomes master of nature's forces he will gain control of his own destiny. It is in man that walketh to direct his steps, and the sooner he learns that no heavenly helper nor earthly counselor can insure his welfare, but that with best foot forward and right arm ready he must make his own way, the sooner will his path be plain and his progress be assured.—Robt. C. Adams.

EVERY thinking being who is not of their [the theologians'] opinion is an Atheist; and every king who does not favor them will be damned. You know, Monseigneur, that the best course one can take is to abandon to themselves those pretended preceptors and real enemies of the human race. Their words, when they are disregarded, are lost in the air like the wind; but if the weight of authority is enlisted in their support, that wind acquires a force which sometimes overturns the throne. I see, Monseigneur, with the natural joy of a heart filled with love for the public good, the immense distance which you put between men who peacefully seek the truth and those who wish to go to war for words which they do not understand. I see that the Newtons, the Leibnitz, the Bayles, the Lockes, souls so elevated, so enlightened, and so gentle, are those who nourish your spirit, and that you reject other sham aliment which you find poisoned or without substance.—Voltaire to Frederick the Great.

VOLTAIRE believed in a varied culture. He was prone to undervalue the man of one talent; the nature with only one cultivated field; the poet, like J. B. Rousseau, who could do nothing but poetry; the man of business who was only a business man; the philosopher who always and only philosophized. He said, more than once, that he should have venerated Newton the more if Newton had written some vaudevilles for the London stage. Friends remonstrated with him upon his absorption in pursuits that seemed to them foreign to his nature. "What shall you gain," asked Cideville, "by knowing the pathway of light and the gravitation of Saturn?" "We must give our souls," he replied, "all the forms possible to them. It is a fire which God has confided to us; we ought to nourish it with whatever we find that is most precious. We must have all imaginable modes of intellectual life, open all the doors of our souls to all the sciences and all the sentiments; and, provided that they do not enter pell-mell, there is room within for every one of them."—Parton.

which we acquire full dominion of that territory, paying the ex-queen $20,000 a

Quinn is preparing to collect and deport to China twenty thousand Chinese on May 5th. The Geary Exclusion act provides that at that time all Chinese who have not registered and been photographed shall be shipped back. Few have done so.

A LARGE pilgrimage of Catholics has left England for the Vatican. The chief motif is to protest against what is called
"the iniquitous spoliation of the Holy See," and "to promote by every lawful means the restoration of the Holy Father to his legitimate rights as sovereign of the States of the Church."

CLEVELAND has so far announced his cabinet appointments thus: secretary of state, Walter Q. Gresham, of Illinois; treasurer, John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky; postmaster-general, Wilson S. Bissell, of Buffalo; secretary of war, Daniel S.
Lamont, of New York; secretary of the interior, Hoke Smith, of Georgia; secretary of agriculture, J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska. The posts of attorney-general and secretary of the navy remain to be filled.

ST. TERESA, or Teresa Wires, the living patron-saint of the Yaqui Indians, who was banished from her mountain home in New Mexico several months ago by order of government authorities, the charge against her being that she was working up a spirit of warfare among the Indians, is making her home at Nogales, Ariz., just across the Mexican line. She continues to perform many so-called miraculous cures by simply laying on her hands, and thousands of ignorant Mexicans and Indians have visited her since she was exiled.

THE Zion Methodist church at Wilkes-barre, Pa., is being crowded with cripples and invalids seeking the miraculous cures of "the Healing Evangelist," Rev. P.
Warnon. Among his reported cures are large numbers of cases of rheumatism, neuralgia, asthma, heart disease, paralysis, deafness, and so on. One account reads: "The four-year-old child of J.
Barney had distorted legs. They had been immovable from birth. The child was held up in view of the audience and the healer only drew his hands once down the limbs and they became perfectly straight."

THE National Divorce Reform League,
a society composed mostly of New Englanders, reports that eight states have appointed commissions to secure uniform divorce laws. If it fails to secure its ends through the states it will endeavor to have the federal Constitution amended so as to give Congress power to regulate the matter for the whole Union. However, a proposed constitutional amendment to that effect has been adversely reported by a decided majority of the judiciary committee of the House of Representatives, on the sound ground that it was in violation of the essential principles of our federal system. The Divorce Reform League disavows responsibility for its introduction as premature.

PRINTED slips containing suggestions for legislation on the school question and apparently expressing the views held by Archbishop Ireland on that subject, are being received through the mail by clergymen, educators, and prominent laymen of every denomination in New York city. It is said that these slips are being quietly circulated throughout the whole country.
Following is a copy of one of them received in this city: "1. The city and state might affiliate parochial schools to the public schools, the secular education being under the state or city superintendent. 2. The parochial school buildings might be rented at a nominal price to the state. 3. The teachers could be Catholic, holding their certificates from the public commissioners, who would have the right to examine both teachers and pupils at any time."

Canada As a Member of Our Union.

The determination of the Quebec paper, the Canada Revue, to appeal to the courts for redress of the grievance which it suffers by the archbishop's ban, is breeding much excitement. The ire of the supporters of the archbishop, we learn from the correspondent of the New York Post, is great, and all sorts of pains and penalties are threatened against the Revue, but the proprietors of the journal remain firm. One of the bitterest attacks comes from the Courrier du Canada, which says that by their threat to take a mandamus against the archbishop, the publishers of the interdicted journal show themselves to be rebels and traitors, for such is any Catholic who asks civil authorities to interfere in the doctrinal or disciplinary direction of the church. A Catholic is a man who submits himself to the authority of the Catholic church. If a dignitary of a church does an injustice to anyone, the offended one has a right to appeal until the supreme tribunal of the pope is reached. But if, instead of following this course, he asks the intervention of a lay authority, he becomes a rebel and commits the enormous crime of a traitor who opens to a stranger the gates of his country. The article then goes on to say that if a Catholic chooses to obey the order of his bishop forbidding him to read an impious journal, there is no court, no mandamus, no monarch, no despot in the world that can force him to read it. Such an order on the part of the bishop belongs to the spiritual and religious domain, and no human power can interfere with it. After congratulating the archbishop upon his conduct, the article adds:

"We can declare to him that he has the support of the whole Catholic church. Yes, we stand there behind the bishop, whose hands it is sought to tie up, ready to defend the sacred power of the one who has been inducted with the crozier and miter to look after the safety of the flock and prevent them drinking from poisonous waters. Let the people of the Canada Revue take out their mandamus, let them drag their archbishop before the courts, let them try and find a judge able to tell a bishop that he has no jurisdiction over readings that are dangerous for the Christian soul, let them exhaust proceedings and vexations. It may be well for Catholics to know what will be the result of all this. If by any possibility the archbishop of Montreal should suffer the insult of a mandamus from a judge having no doctrinal mission and no spiritual authority, the people would then see that a bishop, where the soul and conscience of his people are at stake, stoops but before the divine mandamus of the one who will judge all terrestrial powers, and from whom he holds his episcopal mission. Again we repeat that there is no human power that can force the archbishop of Montreal to take away his ban."

Now, the land where such sentiments as the above are popular is, observers predict, soon to become part of our United States. How this annexation will affect the extraordinary privileges which the Catholic church enjoys in the province of Quebec, is exciting interest in many quarters. Some fancy that a change would be necessary. But this is not so. Among the clearest expositions of the matter is that of the New York Sun, the language of which we shall here adopt. The status of the Catholic church need not, as a matter of constitutional law, be altered in the least. Our federal government is prohibited by our federal Constitution from making any law for the establishment of religion; but there is nothing to prevent any of our states from establishing a particular church within its own territory. If the state constitution forbids such a law, the people who made that constitution can alter it. The Church of England was established in Virginia at the outbreak of the Revolutionary war, and, if the people of Virginia had desired its continuance, that church might have remained established to this day. The federal government could no more interfere with the collection of tithes under a state law than it could with entailed estates, which, by the way, existed in New York for some years after the entrance of the state into the Union. The same thing may be said with regard to the application of a part of the state revenue in Quebec to the maintenance of Catholic schools. That is something with which the federal government has absolutely nothing to do; it lies solely within the competence of the people of Quebec, speaking through their state constitution and state legislature. Some express the opinion that the ecclesiastical taxes now collectible by law would be voluntarily abolished by the people of Quebec before they entered the Union. Such a course is unlikely. But, at all events, the abolition of the ecclesiastical taxes now leviable in Quebec under the provincial constitution is a matter which our federal government could not touch.

It will be decidedly unsatisfactory to have in our Union such states as Quebec will make.

Besides the ill example of states with an established church, there will be the further baneful thing of an increase to the Catholic vote.

This nation of ours will be called upon within the next hundred years to solve questions of government of import indeed deep. May fate grant that the requisit wisdom and sanity be not wanting in the hours when they are needed.

Marriage Marred by Religion.

Maurice Francis Egan, a writer of distinction in the Catholic papers, has just contributed to one of those journals an article on mixed marriages, or marriages of persons who differ in religion. This article throws strong light on that of which all of us are already aware to our pain and shame, the operation of religion in breeding discord and grief in wedded life. Mr. Egan says:

"Congeniality of taste, community of interests, equal cultivation, deep affection, will not atone for the lack of union in the one greatest thing—religion."

These precious fitnesses, these choice and sweet harmonies of spirit—community of taste, accordance of culture, heart affection—are to be defeated, cast away, and wasted, and place opened instead to jarring difference and dislike, simply because the poor young two have chanced to grow up under unlike systems of fraud and imposition whose sole use and cause of being is to fatten liars and rogues.

"The more a Catholic and husband believes and the more he loves the sadder becomes the essential difference between his wife and him."

True, alas! When there are anyway many questions of real pith and significance over which there must necessarily be some dissent and uncongeniality, how infamous to add an unneeded and fictitious one.

"In Germany, in Bavaria, for instance, in Ireland, in Tipperary, for instance, marriages are made on the basis of religion. A young man does not dream of 'paying attention' to a young woman not of his religion."

The circle of opportunities for choosing a life-mate would in most cases be narrower than could be wished even were there no religious limitations. It is deplorable that this none too wide range should be halved, at least, perhaps quartered, by false and imbecil distinctions over nothing.

Mr. Egan goes on to repeat that the state which results from "so many mixed marriages" is "wretched unhappiness." Wretched unhappiness—naught else indeed is seen springing from religion in every respect.

The writer urges that the number of these marriages "must be reduced."

"The young people must be drawn into those social circles where the danger of making marriage engagements with others of a different belief can be avoided. Intelligent parents must shake off their love of comfort, their habit of letting the young people alone, and begin to think seriously of the future of their children. The young must be saved from themselves, and this can only be done by the experience and prudence of their elders used with intelligence."

Thus Catholics and Protestants, already so separated in intercourse that rarely can either party compare its ideas with those of the other, and perchance catch a gleam of light on their validity, must be yet more sedulously kept apart.

The writer concludes with the reiteration that as to preventing the young from making these marriages,

"The fathers and mothers, whom God holds primarily responsible for their children, can if they will."

The person who holds parents responsible for their children is not God, but the priest. There is no God, there is only the priest. The word "God" means "priest." Thus the priest, the swilled and insolent priest, holds parents responsible that, to perpetuate the race of victims and burden-bearers of his fraudulence and preying, they shall tear apart matched and thrilling hearts, trample the sweetest springing flowers of the breast, and set in affection's blessed place cold, sour, and sick distaste. Damned, damned religion!

A Freethought Poet's View of the World.

The late discussion in England over the choice by the government of a poet-laureate, occasioned some persons on this side the wave to propose the establishment of a laureateship here. But to them it was replied that we have no poet worthy—that we have had only one poet of genius, and that was Edgar Allen Poe. Now, Poe, we take delight in informing such of our readers as are not already aware of the fact, was a thorough and outspoken Infidel. Verily the pleasures and prides of us Freethinkers are many; to whatever department of human affairs we happen to turn, we find the greatest men therein to be those of our party.

Mayhap some of our readers of a meditative and philosophizing turn would be pleased to survey a view of the universe entertained by this Freethinking poet. This view, which constitutes one of his most admired poems, runs thus;

"Lo! 'tis a gala night

Within the lonesome latter years!
An angel throng, bewinged, bedight
In veils, and drowned in tears,
Sit in a theater, to see
A play of hopes and fears,
While the orchestra breathes fitfully
The music of the spheres.

"Mimes, in the form of God on high,
Mutter and mumble low,
And hither and thither fly;
Mere puppets they, who come and go
At bidding of vast formless things
That shift the scenery to and fro,
Flapping from out their condor wings
Invisible Wo!

"That motley drama!—oh, be sure
It shall not be forgot!
With its Phantom chased forevermore,
By a crowd that seize it not,
Through a circle that ever returneth in
To the self-same spot;
And much of Madness, and more of Sin
And horror, the soul of the plot!

"But see, amid the mimic rout
A crawling shape intrude!
A blood-red thing that writhes from out
The scenic solitude!
It writhes!—it writhes!—with mortal pangs
The mimes become its food,
And the seraphs sob at vermin fangs
In human gore imbrued.

"Out—out are the lights—out all!
And over each quivering form
The curtain, a funeral pall,
Comes down with the rush of a storm—
And the angels, all pallid and wan,
Uprising, unveiling, affirm
That the play is the tragedy, 'Man,'
And its hero, the conqueror Worm."

The "angel throng" who figure as spectators of this drama of man on the stage of the universe, we are to suppose introduced by the poet solely to fill out the scene and embellish the conception. Poe did not believe in the actual existence of the supernatural races of the Bible.

"The orchestra breathes fitfully
The music of the spheres."

This is a sublime circumstance. It is true that our life-drama is played to the rhythm of the spheres. Our play of existence is cadenced, not, as was once supposed, by the mental motions of a trivial and earth treading deity, but to the roll and pulse of orbs multitudinous, mighty, and magnificent.

"Mimes, in the form of God on high."

That the mimes, or actors, in this play of human existence, are not cast in the form of any God on high, our writer well knew. But he was fain to avail himself of every suggestion which he thought added a poetical interest.

To be told that we

"Mutter and mumble low"

is not very gratifying to our pride, but it is to be feared that our speech is too aptly described thus. Occasionally, to be sure, from some one of us such as we term a "great man," a "genius," an "eminent scientist," there is for a moment heard what may be called a distinct utterance, a tone clear and ringing. But to a being from another and a higher sphere, to a perfectly wise man, the great human hum we sorrowfully admit would seem but muttering and mumbling—perhaps not so much, perhaps only bedlamite maundering and gibbering. However, we are learning to speak better every day.

And mankind

"Hither and thither fly;
Mere puppets they, who come and go
At bidding of vast formless things
That shift the scenery to and fro."

That the scenery of our life is shifted to and fro by "vast formless things" is the modern view which is superseding the old notion that it is shifted by persons, not things, these persons being so far from formless that they possess perfectly defined forms, of the same figure as the human. "Vast formless things" is an expression for the natural forces of the universe that is very apt. That they are "vast" needs not discussion. That they are "formless" is, unfortunately, true to a great extent. Unfortunately, we say, because their formlessness largely prevents man's manipulation of them.

They are often so formless, so vague and fugitive, that we cannot with any satisfactory certainty estimate, foreknow, and deal with them. Some, to be sure, have been cast into neat, exact, and wieldable shapes—mathematics for instance. And the whole body of the sciences, constantly being added to, is a noble and hope-giving congeries of forms, exact and gageable, crystallized through long ages of endeavor. But alas, too much remains shapeless and undigested yet.

Next we come to the sentiment that these forces which urge onward our lives do so through passages of bitterness and sorrow. They are represented as

"Flapping from out their condor wings
Invisible Wo!"

And the Phantom of Happiness though chased forevermore is seized not. Indeed, the whole drama of life is composed but of

"Much of Madness, and more of Sin,
And horror, the soul of the plot."

The gloom of this view belongs solely to the temperament of this particular poet, who was by nature cursed with a desponding and somber spirit. It does not, by any means, belong to the modern and scientific view of the world. This scientific view is one of serenity and hope. Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, to be sure, in his latest poem, on the death of a friend, has some lines, of which Poe's expressions put us in mind, which are equally mournsome. For instance,

"I only see the darkness,
And the force which will not spare"

But we shall pay little attention to this unpretty little piece of despondency, for elsewhere, even in the same poem, our friend nullifies it by views of quite the opposite character. In this one passage he gives himself over to the contemplation of the glooms and severities of human experience; but in all the rest of his writings he abounds in cheery considerations of the joys of life—being, to tell the truth, one of these joys, and that not the least, himself.

Next in the poem "a crawling shape" intrudes—the hateful worm of death. What shall be said to this? A good thing to be said to it, we fancy, is that the worm is being delayed in his appearance later and later with each generation. That is, science is steadily lengthening the average term of human life. So we may look forward with pleasing anticipation to the time when the appearance of his wormship on the scene will be very late indeed.

So much for a poet whose language on some great themes of the universe is strangely impressiv, but who should have been a bit ashamed of himself for losing heart.

Donations.

We have received the following sums to help us in our work: Andrew Sward, $1; James Thompson, 50 cents; O. F. Thornton, $2; Henry Dannenbrink, $1. Also $1 from a friend who says: "Don't publish this letter, for the president of the corporation with which I am connected is a Y.M.C.A. old man." This prohibition, however, is a strong plea for a wider dissemination of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethought books, until mental liberty shall prevail, and no one be afraid of losing the means of sustaining life because of the free and frank expression of his opinion.

A Catholic paper, treating upon the British missionaries in Africa and India, strikes out, strange to say, a little bit of truth—"Some of those British agents with the Bible in their hands have been more solicitous about the land of the heathen than about his soul."

Three-quarters of a million of people visited the Metropolitan Museum of Art last year, of whom one-third made Sunday their calling-day. That is very encouraging to those who began the Sunday-opening agitation, and is a sufficient reward for their labors.

Within a week or two we shall print an examination into "The True Genesis of Christianity," by Thaddeus B. Wakeman. Some recent and some older books serve as a text of Mr. Wakeman's to expose the emptiness of Christianity's pretensions and at the same time expound his philosophy of the "Higher Integration."

After consulting the Japanese government and obtaining its consent, the Vatican has now established in Japan an ecclesiastical hierarchy with territorial titles derived from that country. As fast as the wretched pest of Catholicism is abated in one country it mounts and waxes in another. When wretched man will obtain final relief from the hateful curse, it passes human foresight to tell.

The opposition of the clergy to the great scientific doctrine of evolution finds vent in daily utterances, of which take this sample deliverance at a Methodist council: "To a plain man it is not enough to say that evolution is not proved. Even if proved, it is only shown to affect certain departments of nature. Only extreme men carry it into psychology and ethics; the outlines of orthodox faith are therefore safe and sound."

A European Catholic writer says: "I venture without fear of being mistaken the assertion that the pope has derived from the United States if not a good share of the democratic inspirations which he has been sending out over the world from the Vatican, at least a solid encouragement for them." The church has of course derived the whole of such rational and civilized sentiments as it exhibits from secular sources without.

In France the warfare of Radicals against the Association de Notre Dame de Lusine, in the department du Nord, is still being waged. This association is composed of a number of large manufacturers who have demanded of their employees that they all observe the Roman Catholic ceremonial. Members of the parliament have declared the action illegal as being an attack on religious liberty, and demanded the dissolution of the association.

In some districts of England and Wales there continually occur outbreaks of popular indignation against the oppression of the Church of England. This church, being established by the state, enforces by civil law the payment of tithes. These taxes are frequently refused, and upon distraint by the authorities to collect them mob-violence ensues. The vicar is not unoften mocked and burnt in effigy, or threatened with personal injury. The income of this despotic church, wrung from the needy and laborious by brute force, is $1,000,000 a week. Abomination!

The honesty which the Christian religion is capable of producing when given full control, is illustrated in a communication from Holy Russia: "From all sides comes the same tale of inhuman villanies, of adulteration and rapacity. Seed-corn sent from the Caucasus to a certain district was delivered ground, and mixed with forty per cent of gypsum. The 'special' bread made by a St. Petersburg firm was refused by hungry dogs, and stank even when fresh."

Next week we shall print Otto Wettstein's rejoinder to Miss Chapman. It is perhaps a little ungallant that Mr. Wettstein should so worst a lady, and she must attribute it to the logical weakness of her cause, which is, so far as reason can see, absolutely without facts to sustain it. But Miss Chapman is a brilliant and versatile champion and can give the average male minister several points on how to argue. It is a pity that she cannot get hold of the right end of the matter, but we hope that light will break upon her one of these days.

Mrs. Tel Sono, a Japanese convert to Christianity, considers that the way to spread that religion is to build for the girls of the nobility a great school. If one of the higher rank, she says, should become a Christian, so great is the force of example there the conversion would be imitated by hundreds in the lower classes. The fact is that this is the way in which about all of the nations of Christendom have attained their present belief. Cunning ecclesiastics applied themselves to the conversion of the great, whose force and fashion then made a ready conquest of the rest.

The Catholics have a great university and headquarters at Washington, the Methodists are taking up collections to build one, and the Baptists are talking of following suit. Now President King of the Washington Hebrew Congregation says that he "would like to see the Jews of the United States raise a worthy religious edifice in the nation's capital." The headquarters of powerful organizations would better be anywhere than in the capital city of a nation. George Washington counseled the selection of Washington as the capital, in preference to a greater city, on the consideration that particular bodies or interests could there less readily master the national legislature and wield it to their own ends.

Our readers may be entertained, in passing, by the following excerpt from a history of the use of anesthetics: "One objection offered to the use of anesthetics was that man was born to suffer, that pain was a part of the curse of Adam, and that the annulment of pain was sinful and opposed to the divine decree. In answer to this, Dr. Simpson showed that the first operation performed on man was the excision of a rib from Adam, out of which to make man, and that before beginning to operate God himself cast the man into a deep sleep. We can laugh now at the objection and the argument; but fifty years ago it was on such objections and arguments that hung the question of the continuation or cessation of the conquest of pain."

Elbridge T. Gerry, of New York city, president of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, a few days ago stigmatized the morality of the dramatic profession in language which has called forth much indignation. He is, too, pushing with unusual strenuousness his work of excluding child actors and actresses from the stage. Colonel Ingersoll has expressed himself on the matter to a reporter thus: "At the bottom of the Gerry society's objection to the singing and dancing of children you will find the Puritan idea that those who enjoy themselves in this world will be damned in the next. When I think of the thousands of children engaged in all kinds of work, half fed and half clothed, it seems to me the very extreme of absurdity that these children shall not be allowed to drop their burdens, to wipe away their tears, and celebrate their deliverance with dance and song."

A special correspondent of a leading English paper recently made a tour of the famine-stricken districts of Russia. His revelations throw light upon the causes of the awful sufferings with which the Russian people are being afflicted. "Everywhere," he says, "were marks of the most reckless extravagance. Immense forests have been wantonly cut, rivers neglected, and the climate ruined. The land is exhausted and the agricultural system is a hopeless failure." The investigations of this gentleman show that what the superstitious Russians have regarded as a visitation from God is but the natural consequence of man's ignorance and misdevotion. It is evident that no mere system of relief, however widespread and generous, can meet the situation. What is wanted is Freethought and education.

The European edition of the Herald notes that Naples and Rome owe their reputation of unhealthfulness to a state of things which no longer exists. Until a few years ago Naples drew all its waters from wells, and typhoid fever was virtually epidemic in the city. Since the introduction of the Serino water and the closing of the wells the disease has almost disappeared. In Rome before it became the capital the drainage was bad, and in spite of the numerous aqueducts a large number of wells were in use. The Italian government has thoroughly drained the city, and when the cholera last appeared in Italy the government closed the wells, which still remain closed. The result has been to reduce the deaths from typhoid fever to less than three per week in a population of four hundred and fifteen thousand. Our object in reproducing these facts is to add that the period during which these Italian cities lapsed into their unsanitary condition was that of papal rule, and the present era of their redemption is that of Freethought.

On the utterances of William II. of Germany the New York Herald remarks: "The emperor labors under the delusion that the almighty is his personal champion, and that the almighty doesn't care a farthing for the vast populace whom William rules by the accident of birth. The people, on the other hand, have an impression that the almighty has wearied of the empty pomp and ceremony of earthly kings and has handed over to the multitude the responsibility of social development." This latter opinion is ours, and we believe further that "the almighty has wearied of" pretty much all other earthly things as well. In these lonesome latter days we search and search for his earmark upon some piece of work. We really cannot remember when we have seen his finger in a pie. Yes, there has been "handed over to the multitude the responsibility of social development" and everything else. The "almighty" does nothing; the people must do all.

With Our Congressmen.

News and Notes.

The Freethought Exchange has been organized at Washington city. I lectured before it on Sunday, February 19th. I am in hopes that by means of this exchange the large Freethought element of the capital can be gathered together for practical effort. In my address on "The American Republic—Its Principles and Its Perils," I outlined the methods of action by which the Freethought Exchange might arouse Liberals to harmonious activity. Especially is the necessity of this now emphasized by the present religious legislation of Congress concerning the World's Fair.

J. E. Remsburg added greatly to the interest of our movement by his lecture on Tuesday evening on "False Claims." It was an inclement night, but the hall was full, and the discourse was received with warm approval. The matter was presented in a light undoubtedly new to many present, but the logic of the speaker won the entire audience to his radical positions. This lecture will be a splendid impulse to further work at Washington.

I had the pleasure of spending the whole of Wednesday with Remsburg, and it was a delightful recuperation after laboring in the somewhat arid fields of Congressional volubility and uncertain promise. It happened that we had camped during the late war on the same ground, and together with Hyland C. Kirk, who was also in my regiment and with whom I used to talk theology while eating hard-tack, we went against the blustering winds to Fort Ethan Allen, and took a view of the place where thirty years ago we had tramped and stood guard, and looked forth in the moonlight upon the straggling city, the broad river, the chain bridge, and faintly luminous in the distance the vast dome of the Capitol. The vague sweet hopes of youth and patriotism were then throbbing in our bosoms, and in spite of the difficulties and dangers of our position the world seemed grand and beautiful. We have learned much since then. We are wiser to-day. We know the world. We don't have to eat hard-tack any more, or clean our musket, or pace the midnight beat, or drill in the hot sun, or march against the storm, but I do not think we are any happier than in those days of brilliant youth, when dreams were plentiful and martial music stirred our pulses; when an ineffable glory filled the spacious air and we tramped onward with reckless spirit. To stand upon the old parade ground with old comrades and think of the thirty years that have passed, be compelled to admit that we are growing old and that we have not quite so much faith as we had then, was a somewhat sad and strange experience, but life rolls on and the battle is not ended. The conflict is far greater, far more terrible, far more sublime, than we ever thought it to be in those days of sunny and stormful youth.

We visited the Capitol, etc. Remsburg struck Simpson, the famous Kansas representative, not a large man by any means, rather small and wiry, but intelligent and with a shrewd look for the main chance. He thinks that Congress will yet repeal the Sunday-closing clause. He is in favor of Sunday opening and states that a majority of the representatives are in favor of it also; that a great change has been wrought by the agitation of the matter. All this is true, but how the matter is to be brought before Congress I cannot see. The committee will not report. Perhaps by skilful manipulation of parliamentary rules the question may yet be brought before the House and decisive action taken. One week more will define the attitude of Congress.

The churches will not accept the Houk compromise bill. The Pennsylvania Sabbath Association meeting at Harrisburg in the House of Representatives thunders its disapproval. This same association was addressed by the governor of the state, Governor Pattison, who was president of the convention. He declared the old law was as broad and liberal as if it had been written within the hour. Not a line or sentence expressed narrowness or bigotry.

He said the people who favored the Sabbath of the founders of the republic were willing that the law should be posted at the heads of newspapers as an evidence of the virtue, patriotism, wisdom, and morality of the men who framed it. The act of 1794, he said, gives all the liberty and opportunity.

It will thus be seen that the churches of this country—backed up by politicians, by governors, Congressmen, the judges of the court—are determined to maintain the infamous legislation of a hundred years ago.

The Chicago Times urges the commissioners to give back the money and open the gates on Sunday. The New York World says, "Open the gates anyway." One thing is sure, if the gates are closed, there will be a tremendous agitation in Chicago, and it will increase from Sunday to Sunday. We say to Liberals, keep up the agitation. Don't for a moment think that the battle is ended. Who is the revolutionary party in this matter? Congress. It has absolutely defied law and Constitution. Why, then, should we be bound by its action, when its action is treason?

I am sorry that Dr. Westbrook has allowed himself to fall into personalities. I have treated him with the utmost courtesy. I have not called names. I have stuck to the argument; Dr. Westbrook has not. He has not answered me on any point. He says he is not in favor of "brute force." I say he is, for the act of Congress to close the World's Fair on Sunday is an expression of brute force. He is in favor of this legislation, which is "damnable orthodoxy," which is "chains and slavery." If Dr. Westbrook upholds this act of Congress, he upholds and defends everything that is in this act; and therefore I hold him responsible and will hold him responsible at the bar of public opinion for all the wrong, oppression, and meanness that is in this act. Not until he repudiates this act can he redeem himself. I condemn him only by his own argument. I have not attacked his character as a man. I have only attacked the logic of his position. I consider the discussion to be all-important. We must thoroughly understand the situation. That is my sole reason for engaging in the controversy.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Science and Progress.

A Prudent Adjective.

A religious weekly denounces the recent Auto-da-fé at Paris, Tex., as an "outrage unparalleled and unapproached by the horrors of the pagan dark ages." The word "pagan" redeems the absurdity of the proposition. During the Christian dark ages some 3,500,000 worse outrages were perpetrated under the auspices of our Holy Mother Church.

Degrees of Danger.

In the Padernal range of Rio Arriba county, New Mexico, a slumbering volcano has resumed activity, and the eruptions of flaming cinders are accompanied by frequent earthquake shocks. The apprehensions on the score of the latter phenomena are, however, allayed by the report that the orthodox natives are marching in procession and shouting hymns of penance. Our Mexican neighbors divide earthquakes into three classes, calling for three different methods of salvation. Temblores (mere tremors) can be remedied by means of religious ceremonies. Golpes (more violent shocks) are apt to lead to an appeal for government assistance. Terremotos, or earthquake proper, call for self-help, and the natives at once remove their wives and children to a place of safety.

A Superlative Compliment.

The most flattering tribute to the memory of Voltaire was, after all, paid by a priest, the Jesuit Du Jardin, who summed up his diatribe with the remark that "the individual activity of that monster has done more injury to the interests of the Church than the attacks of all the Protestant sects, combined with those of the Turk and the Devil."

Progress of Tolerance.

In spite of an avalanche of orthodox petitions Premier Sagasta, of Spain, has refused to suppress the Madrid Protestant church, and merely enjoins its trustees to avoid superfluous advertisements of its existence. And in spite of ecclesiastic bluster Spanish Freethought journals continue to multiply. Don Moreno Acosta, of Barcelona (the Spanish Chicago), announces a new magazine, La Piqueta del Libre Pensamiento (The Vanguard of Free-thought, as we might translate it), a fearless, radical little monthly, that is sold openly in every larger town of the peninsula. Imagine the fate of the writers and printers two hundred years ago!

Pork-fed Prophets.

The state of Illinois can claim to lead the world in the production, not only of pork and corn, but of millennium prophets. George Schweinfurth, the idol of the Rockford Angel Association, still maintains his divine mission and keeps up his "Heavenly Hog Harem," as Brick Pomeroy describes his angel-roost. Dr. Cyrus Teed ("Koresch") continues to favor his converts with revelations, but must yield the palm of modesty to Harold Brodrick, the Chicago Messiah, who has just published a new testament, "dedicated to my dear father, the Lord, by his son, Harold, the Christ." Messrs. Baird & Lee have issued that latest version of Illinois scriptures, which in platitudes is perhaps rivaled by Salvation Army pamphlets or the Book of Mormon, but in absolute nonsense certainly only by the Revelation of St. John, "Apocalyptic Jack," as a German humorist calls him. In the exordium of his gospel Mr. Brodrick warns unbelievers against the danger of ridiculing his pretensions and repeatedly clinches his argument with the remark that "the Lord told me so in Bury street."

Signs of the Times.

Louis Kossuth remarks that "great revolutions are not nearly so apt to break out under wicked intelligent as under weak and foolish rulers"—a truth certainly confirmed often enough to dismay the present sovereigns of Europe with "fears of change." The present incumbent of the Prussian throne is intellectually the least favored of all the successors of the Great Elector. Queen Victoria is fast becoming a female George III., and the emperor Francis Joseph a male Maria Theresa, with her home inquisitions and literary blue laws. Spain is getting restive under her cowl-and-petticoat yoke, and a correspondent of the Contemporary Review informs his readers that the present czar is quizzed by his own relatives, and that in his crown-prince days his countrymen used to nickname him "the young steer," and now call him the "steer," with or without qualifying adjectives.

Battle Creek.

The county-seat of Calhoun county, Mich., is for its size about the most prosperous town of the prosperous Northwest. With a population of not quite fifteen thousand inhabitants it supports fourteen newspapers, sixteen hotels, flourishing machine factories, printing-press factories, furniture works, flour mills, knitting-mills, rolling-mills, and the largest sanitarium west of Cleveland, O. Drunkenness is rare, mendicancy almost unknown; yet a stranger visiting the town on a Sunday might come to suspect the correctness of his almanac. The shops are kept wide open, hucksters peddle their wares from house to house, and the big factories resound with the boom of steam-engines. Battle Creek is a stronghold of the Seventh Day Adventists, and after tentative attempts at their suppression their neighbors have wisely concluded to let them alone, or even to encourage their enterprise on the day which neither nature nor science can be said to distinguish from any other day of the week.

Gleams of Daylight.

The Freethinker Vanini (burnt at the stake A.D. 1619) had a trick of propagating his views by stating the theories of pagan philosophers as plausibly as possible and then pretending to refute them by quoting the idiotic objections of his Christian contemporaries. In a similar way gleams of light begin to penetrate the darkness of holy Russia, and the secret skeptics of the St. Petersburg press are groaning about the impiety of the late editor Katkoff of the Moscow Gazette, who, in a private letter, remarks that "the evidence against the historical truth of the New Testament is such that no inquirer of common intellectual honesty can resist it any longer."

Celestial Bombshells.

The Morning News, of Dallas, Tex., describes a thunder-storm which visited the neighborhood of Gray Hill a few weeks ago, and which seems to break the record of the American hail chronicle. Some of the ice chunks picked up in the open fields weighed four pounds, and varied in size from four to seven inches. The correspondent of the News adds that some of these aerial bombs were hollow, and contained particles of black dirt, a circumstance not easy to explain, unless the heavens are weeping tears of soot at the anti-Sabbatarian tendency of the Texas press.

A Complication of Horrors.

Ex-queen Natalie of Servia threatens to publish her memoirs, and as the Danube, too, is about to overflow its banks, the wretched little kingdom is thus menaced with the compound calamity of a water and mud deluge.

Industrial Coliseums.

The gun foundry of Essen covers an area of twenty-two acres, and the woolen mills of Saltaire, England, contain brick enough to build three ordinary villages. Some of the St. Paul grain elevators can store the produce of a good-sized county, and in Glasgow, Scotland, there is a factory chimney four hundred and sixty-eight feet high and another four hundred and fifty-five—both considerably exceeding the height of St. Paul's cathedral. Certainly an encouraging change since the times when the best architects limited their enterprise to the construction of heaven-kissing church-steeple, and hell-approaching dungeons for the confinement of heretics.

Rejected Compromise.

The "Happiness in Hell" article of the Nineteenth Century is denounced by our orthodox friends in a way suggesting the probability that they would renounce their pet winter resort altogether, rather than consent to impair its usefulness as a bugbear institution.

Outbidding Jehovah.

Baron Hirsch is trying to provide homes for millions of refugees, and is sending his agents to Mexico and the Argentine Republic; also to Algiers and Queensland, without renouncing the hope of finding a suitable site for a colony somewhere in the southern highlands of the United States. As for his protégés, they are willing to go almost anywhere, even back to Russia, rather than to the "Promised Land" of their Jehovah-ridden forefathers.

F. L. OSWALD.

The World Growing Better as Religion Declines.

From the New York Sun.

Mere existence is sufficient reason for thankfulness on the part of the generation which is on earth at this period of its history. Never before was the pursuit of knowledge so swift as now, and never before was the chase so well directed to the goal. The remaining years of this century are few, but measured by their accomplishment in politics, society, and science, they are likely to be of more value and more interest than whole centuries which have already passed.

This is a wonderfully interesting, a peculiarly exhilarating time in which we are so fortunate as to live. The world is more beautiful than ever before and a better place to dwell in. Let us, then, sound the notes of rejoicing and pour forth the songs of thanksgiving!

What I Know About God.

There has been quite a little discussion going on recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to the existence of a God. I do not propose to take any hand in this discussion, but propose to show the kind of God the Christians worship.

They say that their God is possessed of all power, all knowledge, is unchangeable, everywhere present, forbearing, tender, forgiving, has a care for his children which no earthly parent can manifest, "and his mercy endureth forever."

We read that God performed his great creative act in six days and rested on the seventh.

Now, it is to be supposed that when he began his work he was fresh and vigorous and tore away like a young stallion when his bridle-teeth begin to start. He worked six days and got worn down and tired and took a day to rest. He couldn't rest unless he was tired.

Could God pass from this vigorous, forceful, energetic condition, and then rest and be restored to his former vigorous condition, without changing? Impossible.

Tally one—God is not unchangeable. Didn't God make man, and after due deliberation pronounce him a good job, and afterward repent of making him? Tally two—God either lacked the power to fashion a man to suit him, or else he had not the foresight to see how he would turn out. After he had found out his great mistake, and repented, did he not keep right on bringing men into existence, when he knew, with the exception of one old bummer and his family, he was going to drown the whole God-forsaken batch, good, bad, and indifferent, tagrag and bobtail? Does this act show forth his mercy, tenderness, and forbearance? Does it not show indignity? Why should he bring all the animals into existence when he knew that he would drown them all in a flood? Why should he show a preference for the few animals which Noah selected for his caravan and drown all the rest? Did they run riot and displease God, and bring down his wrath? Doesn't this show that he either got muddled or fuddled?

Doesn't God know all about the tyrannical acts of the czar of Russia—about the inhuman treatment of the Jews? Doesn't he know that women are outraged and starving children crying for bread? Doesn't he know about the suffering up in the mining prisons of Siberia, when the cruel lash takes the last remaining spark of manhood and independence out of the subject, and leaves him a mental and physical wreck? He witnesses the cruel torture of the knout; sees the condemned victim writhing in agony, and does not lift his almighty finger to prevent it. These great wrongs cannot escape his knowledge, he must have the power to prevent them and does not do it. We would curse and execrate a man who would act in that way. Get down on your marrowbones, O ye slabbering Christians, and turn yourselves into savages by worshiping such an irrational, savage God.

Ever since I was a boy no sermon has been considered complete without a fling at Infidel France. In point of humanity France stands as far above the Christian nation of Russia as the heavens are above the solid earth.

It is supposed by Christians that God stood at the elbow of Watts and other great hymn-writers and gave them a touch of inspiration when they composed their sacred songs. These hymns proclaim the glory of God and play a conspicuous part at protracted meetings, and Christians aver that Watts and the other hymn-writers are in heaven, while Burns and Byron dishonored God by their irreverent writings and therefore must be in hell. But their writings are found in every respectable library, while not a hymn-book is found in one library out of a hundred, even of Christians. "Holy Willie's Prayer," "Tam O'Shanter," and "Don Juan" are read by thousands in spite of hell and the fear of God. Doesn't it beat all how God's holy lickspittles are overlooked and neglected, while these hell-deserving sinners are courted and honored? It shows that in spite of the protecting care of the Christian's imaginary Joss, wit and genius will triumph over superstition and holy slush. It shows that pious fools are not favored on earth if they are in heaven. It shows that sensible people find most pleasure in what Christians consider the service of the devil. In my opinion he is a great deal the best fellow—the cutest, anyway.

God was present when the iron collar, the thumb-screw, the rack, the iron boot, and all the other instruments of Christian torture, were invented, and knew the groans and agonies they would produce, and let the hellish work go on without interference or sign of disfavor. "And his mercy endureth forever." He was present when human beings had their hearts cut out, their tongues torn from their throats, their ears cropped, their noses slit, and their joints pulled apart in pulleys. He saw the innocent flayed alive, hanged, crushed, skinned, roasted, boiled, and suffer every measure of torture which Christian cruelty could inflict. He had the power to stop their infernal torture. Why did he not do it? If he could not he is not omnipotent; if he would not he is a savage. Women have been whipped, witches hanged, fires have raged, epidemics have laid thousands low, men have butchered each other by millions, famines have laid whole countries desolate, storms have raged, and drouths and floods have done their destructive work. Is God the author of all things? Then to whom shall we attribute these destructive agencies? Must it not be admitted that God is the author of all evil as well as the author of all good?

God moves in a mysterious way,
Just how no one can tell;
He sometimes makes a grand display
And sometimes raises hell.

Christians claim that God answers prayer. Can he do a thing in answer to prayer which he would not have done, without changing? Mountebank Moody claims that he saved the Spree by prayer. If this is so, these great steamship lines would pay him fabulous prices to persuade God not to send storms to endanger their vessels. It would be the cheapest insurance in the world. I should think it would be a good scheme for God to take in Moody as a partner and give him entire charge of the storm department. Moody could give his entire attention to saving vessels, and God would have more time to devote to protracted meetings and wayward ministers and religious services in schools and heresy trials, and more time to turn the faucet, as represented by Heston (see THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 4th), at the World's Fair, when the gates are closed on Sunday. I think this would be a grand scheme for both God and Moody. The style of the firm would be "Father, Son, Holy Ghost, Moody & Co."

God has talked with a great many men and instructed others how to write for his old scrap-book. He has filled others with the Holy Ghost, but not one of these has ever told us how God looks. Jacob met him in a wrestling match, and through foul play, got his leg broken, not being on his guard, and believing that a champion of his reputation would observe the rules and not take undue advantage. Jacob must have been a man of good staying qualities, for he wrestled all night, and might have won the match if God had not "touched the inside of his thigh." Jacob tells all about this great match, and says he saw him face to face, and yet gives us no clew to his appearance. Moses saw him on one occasion, and although he had the peculiar gift of writing an account of his own death and burial, gives us no account of his great posterior proportions. I have talked with a great many who claimed to know all about God, but when I have asked them to give a description of him it has proved a flat failure. And with candor it must be said, that to the genius of Heston is due the credit of giving the most accurate delineation of God which has ever been attempted. Sometimes he represents God entire—head, heels, and stomach—then only his head and a horn. I never saw him take a "horn," yet I know that he has a taste for the "critter," and often gets gloriously fuddled, or else he would not do a thing and pronounce it all right, and then get mad and swear in his wrath, and destroy what he pronounced in his sober moments very good. I tell you God has queer streaks. It may be owing to birthmarks, but anyway I never could get the hang of him. How can anyone account for his bringing a human being into existence when he knows that he can live but a little while and will be buffeted and abused by brainless Christians, and then die and be compelled to report at the headquarters of old Splitfoot, where the worm dieth not and the smoke of his torment ascendeth up forever and ever?

O ye Christian nincompoops, is that the best your God can do?

The most charitable view is suggested by Heston's cartoon where he is represented as turning the faucet to the barrel in the clouds to supply the guzzling saints below. Occasionally he takes a "smile" himself, and when his head begins to swell a job doesn't look to him just as it did when he commenced it.

He advises his chosen ones to take a little for the "stomach's sake," and he would not be unlikely to do what he advised others to do. And, having what Shakspeare calls an "unbounded stomach," it takes an "old sniffer" to settle it. And during such times he doubtless got into bad company and made a little too free with old Dave and Josh and men of that ilk. And I think it must have been when one of these spells was on that he got into a rage and "swore in his wrath," and ordered women to be ripped up alive and little children to be killed, and raised "l" generally.

O thou almighty God, high and lifted up! I have a question for you, and you need not be afraid to give a square answer, for it will not be spread all over the neighborhood: Did you write all the nauseous, disgusting, filthy stuff found in Genesis, Leviticus, Numbers, and elsewhere through your old scrap-book? If so, hadn't you been taking a little too much for your stomach's sake?

It may be that he had been taking an old "stomach-settler" and Moody took him just in the nick of time when he saved the Spree. Now this may seem blasphemous to some, but it is all right if taken in a "spiritual" sense, as much of the old scrap-book is. To be serious, I will bet Moody a village lot in the New Jerusalem that he may pray to God when at his best, and I will make an image out of wood and daub it over with yellow clay and get just as many favors from the image as Moody can from his God.

Now, if Moody cannot succeed in forming a combine with the old woman—"ripper" and child—"killer" he ought to unite with Sam Jones and Talmage and form a sort of holy trinity. The three combined would form a spiritual battery that would make the throne of God tremble. They could hypnotize God and obtain any desired favor. If the services of the combine could be secured at the World's Fair at Chicago neither the cholera nor any other calamity would come within gunshot. Why, such a spiritual battery could handle a storm with the utmost nonchalance. It could stop chain lightning or an earthquake under full head and snuff out a volcano as an old woman would a candle.

Now, this man Talmage is a man of ponderous corporosity. He knows more about God and his old scrap-book than any other man living. God is perfect, and whatever he does must be perfect—and he made Mr. Talmage. He doesn't believe the Bible in "spots" and "streaks." He knows that every line and syllable in the old scrap-book was written by the finger of the almighty.

Now, Mr. Talmage, will you please tell us how many books God has written? The Christians have a book which they know was written by God, the Mormons have one, the Mohammedans one, the Persians, the Hindoos, and you and your God know how many more. Did God write all of these books? If he did not, then some man or men must have written them to deceive the people. Mr. Talmage, will you give us a rule so that we can tell the God-written from the man-written?

If God wrote the old scrap-book, wasn't he engaged in rather scurvy business? If God is the author of such stuff as is found scattered through the Bible, then everyone has a license to use the foulest language which he can force through his lips, and should be commended for getting a sniff at Comstock's bag of Fijii curiosities. What would you think, Mr. Talmage, of a part of Genesis and Leviticus and Solomon's Song as literature for boys and girls? What would you think of making liberal quotations from those and other books of the holy "what-is-it" and having them put in pamphlet form to lie around loose in the common schools? Don't you think it would give the young exalted ideas of the great heavenly mogul?

He plants his footsteps on the sea
And rides upon the storm.

Now, Mr. Talmage, did you ever see his footsteps? Did you ever see him ride the storm? Just give us the size of his footsteps and we can calculate his proportions. Did he have a saddle when he rode the storm, or did he ride bareback? Did he wear spurs? Since you are on such intimate terms with the great monarch of the skies, would it not be a grand scheme for you to put him on exhibition at the World's Fair and have him ride the storm booted and spurred before the assembled multitude? Wouldn't it be a grand spectacle to see him walk up and down the lake? Heston would be there and give us a picture from real life.

And then would it not be well to have him perform a few miracles? Not of turning water into wine, or rods into serpents, or of making the lame walk or the blind see; there is too much of the thimblery about such performances. But have him call the dead from their graves. I presume their old friends would be glad to see them. I would not have him turn all the water of Lake Michigan into blood; but just let him try his hand on a mile square out in front of the Exposition. Such an exhibition would attract visitors from every quarter of the globe, and help to make up the loss which will be sustained by closing the gates on Sundays. After such a demonstration there wouldn't be an Atheist on the ground. "Every knee would bow and every tongue confess," and your fame, Mr. Talmage, would be heralded to the utmost corners of the earth.

Bring us nearer to this God, Mr. Talmage, that we may study him more closely. There is too much that we do not understand. You say he is a God of mercy, possessed of all knowledge and power. And yet he created the animals and knew that a part of them would be the natural food of another part, and that the most savage and ferocious would claw and tear the most innocent and helpless. If he had all knowledge and power, where is the mercy? If God did these things, the "claw" and "tear" must have been in him. He plows up the solid crust of the earth with an earthquake and thousands perish. Does not this look like bringing human beings into existence only to destroy them? Where is his mercy?

I had just finished this paragraph when an evening paper was brought in giving an account of an earthquake in one of the Mediterranean islands, which shattered the buildings and killed and wounded hundreds of people. What did he do that for? If he is fond of earthquakes why did he not get up one in mid-ocean, where it would not endanger human life? The general effect would have been far grander. I should think he would have been as much pleased with the splashing water as with the shattered buildings and the groans of the wounded and dying. Perhaps he had been taking a "little" for his stomach's sake.

He touches a slow match to a volcano, and gets a safe distance away, and then lets it belch forth and bury cities out of sight under the lava. Such an act of perfidy would condemn any human being to everlasting infamy. He sends terrific storms, and knows that vessels will go to the bottom freighted with human beings. Yet he gives them no warning before they start on their voyage, neither will he lessen the fury of the storm. Does he possess all knowledge—does he possess all power? Then get down on all fours like spaniels and bark and howl to this celestial savage, who does not do as well as he knows or as well as he can. "And he drove the inhabitants out of the valley, but could not drive them out of the mountain because they had chariots of iron." Where is his almighty power? Cut another notch in the tally-stick. "And it repented him that he had made man." Should a being possessed of all knowledge do a job in such a bungling way that he would repent of doing it? Don't forget to tally.

Why bring such a monster as Probst into existence, knowing that he would murder a whole family, including helpless children? He lived but a little while, was a curse to his kind, and dropped into an eternal hell, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched. Put almighty power into the hands of a being who makes such blundering calculations and who could tell what would come next? Who would trust a man who is just as apt to sink the boat as to land you safe on shore?

Think of the condition of the human family. Up to the time of Christ all the countless millions were created for no other purpose than to keep up the fires in hell. And Christ has not made our prospect much brighter; for, according to the creed, the multitude are to be damned, the few only saved.

Broad is the road that leads to death,
And thousands flock together there,
While wisdom shows a narrow path
With here and there a traveler.

If there is no way on earth or among men whereby the human family can be saved, then nineteen-twentieths of the race were brought into existence only to be damned, for there is that portion who never did and never will hear of a savior.

Christians claim that whichever way we turn our eyes we see the work of a designing hand. But does not the plan of bringing a great proportion of the race into existence only to send them to hell show that the designer is on a level with the most brutal savage? I have no use for such a God.

Assuming that the workings of nature are but the designs of God, is there not about as much reason to blame as to praise? If we praise God for an abundant harvest, should we not with as much reason blame him when he sends the drouth, the flood, and the famine?

Is it not plain that if there is a being who has all-power and who presides over the affairs of this world, he must be pleased with what we suffer, or he would order things in such a way that we would not suffer?

Some day it will be made known that there is no power on high who is affected by what we suffer, who sees our troubles or sympathizes with us in any way. That supposed power is deaf to our cries, blind to our condition, dumb to our entreaties. The race is a blind chance. Man is a creature of circumstances governed by the conditions of birth, environment, and other influences beyond his control. There is no imaginary hell to punish a man for what he cannot help, no imaginary heaven to reward him for what he is compelled to do. To us there was no existence before this life commenced. There will be no existence after this life ceases. God's angels and devils are creatures of the human imagination and their supposed attributes are but the reflection of the love, fear, hatred, and revenge of the mind of man. The supernatural will pass away, the natural will be left.

JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y.

The Cause in Washington.

The following extract from a synopsis of the farewell sermon of Evangelist Brown, of the Baptist church, gives evidence of the spirit that actuates the clergy. The remarks of Brown were heartily indorsed by the ministers of the Ministerial Alliance:

The address of the afternoon was made by Evangelist Brown on the subject "The Home, the School, Temperance, and Good Government."

The saloon is a school for the prison and the brothel. It is a hot-bed of the gambling-den, and leads on to defalcation and forgery. It is the source of irreligion and infidelity.

The home must be protected, the public schools must be protected. I say to Romanism, "Hands off the public schools!" I say to Infidelity, "Hands off the public schools!" The leaders of the Infidel Club of this city have been terrorizing the schoolteachers who have been singing Christian hymns in their schools. A man who would do this in the South would not be permitted to remain in the community.

What are the facts? A large number of the members of the Washington Secular Union are total abstainers. A majority of the members of the Tacoma Secular Union are earnest temperance workers.

No genuine Infidel can possibly be a drunkard, for the one great principle of Liberalism is justice; the first lesson, "Make heaven for yourself, for your loved ones, by promoting the happiness of all around you." The drunkard makes a hell for himself, a hell for his home; instead of promoting the happiness all around him he destroys it. The assertion that Infidelity promotes intemperance is a foul calumny, scarce justified by Rom. iii, 7, but worthy of the clergy who, until Infidels raised agitation by advocating abstinence, indulged in a drunken orgie at every ordination and convocation, in obedience to the teaching of God's holy word (Prov. xxxi).

The statistics of the state prison prove that the Sunday-school is far ahead of the saloon in supplying criminals, even according to the public declarations of Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, the great Methodist organ.

The avowed Christians who were regular attendants at Sunday-school in their youth fill our prisons and penitentiaries, while Infidelity is without a representative.

There have been a few instances of some Bible-kickers, graduates of Sunday-school and church, who, disgusted on account of real or fancied injury, denounce Christianity, but have never evolved from its teachings far enough to make application, much less to be admitted, as members of any Secular Union, having landed in state prison; but cases even of such mis-called Infidels are few and far between.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Protestants generally, and none more fiercely than Brown and the members of the Ministerial Alliance, would denounce the using of the Douay or Roman Catholic Bible in our public schools. To offer prayers to the Virgin Mary or to sing parts of high mass would render them frantic in efforts to suppress what they would denounce as gross outrages. They do not realize that the use of the Protestant Bible, prayers, and revival hymns is just as objectionable, just as outrageous to the Catholic, Jew, and Liberal, and that they owe to the efforts of the Washington Secular Union protection from objectionable religious exercises and instruction in our public schools, and they now show their gratitude by desiring to drive us out of the community, together with all who are not as bigoted and fanatical as themselves.

CHARLESWORTH BRADEN DISCUSSION.

The shameless duplicity and lack of honor of the best educated of the Seattle clergy were exemplified at the Charlesworth Braden discussion. The Ministerial Alliance made the arrangements—that is, they appointed a committee to act for Braden and decide conditions of the debate. On the last night, witnessing the utter and complete defeat of Braden and the disgust of the audience, including even the Campbellites, up serenely bobs Rev. Mr.

George, president of the Seattle Ministerial Alliance, and announces that the Ministerial Alliance never had indorsed Braden; that Braden was simply and only the representative of the Campbellite church.

They repudiated Braden because of his defeat, but how they would have insisted on a full share of the honor and glory had Braden met success instead of utter and overwhelming defeat.

The Christians could hardly reconcile the public repudiation of Braden, after the Alliance had appointed a committee to arrange debate; and so Rev. Mr. George had to publish in the Post-Intelligencer an equivocation attempting justification of his course, in which, although one of the most bitter haters of Roman Catholics, he lauds the silly sophisms and slush of Father Lambert, and gives a Roman Catholic publisher's address and recommends purchase of the Roman Catholic priest Lambert's attempted defense of Christianity—a tacit confession that all Protestant ministers' efforts in that direction had proved utter failures; and to-day the Ministerial Alliance sneak behind the skirts of a Catholic priest's frock as their only refuge and defense from the assaults of the boy-Infidel, Charlesworth.

SUNDAY LAWS.

The Olympic Theater continues to be well patronized every Sunday evening, and our prosecuting attorney Snell asks the Ministerial Alliance and the city council, "Why is it unlawful to have vocalists and musicians exercise their art in one building, and right, praiseworthy, and lawful in another? Why should it be made a crime for one man to draw on his imagination and by impassioned declamation appeal to the emotions of the audience in one building, and yet be a virtue if done in another building?"

TACOMA SECULAR UNION—PAINE CELEBRATION.

The most severe snowstorm that perhaps ever raged in the Sound country was at its worst on Sunday afternoon and evening, January 29th. Most of the churches shut their doors. The snow was two to three feet deep, street-cars were blocked, and even the cable-cars unable to run, while the snow fell and was whirled around in the chilling wind that pierced to the very marrow. Yet over one hundred ladies and gentlemen assembled at Germania Hall and greatly enjoyed the "Paine celebration." The dramatic class of the Tacoma Secular Union made its debut and achieved grand success. The lecture of Mrs. F. C. Reynolds on "The Services of Thomas Paine in Behalf of Liberty" was listened to with absorbing interest, and punctuated with enthusiastic applause. A general desire is expressed for a repetition of the entire entertainment.

EXEMPTION OF CHURCH PROPERTY FROM TAXATION.

I have a reliable party watching legislative action at Olympia. I paid one visit to the capital, and shall go there as soon as our petition is presented.

I have distributed two thousand petitions throughout the state, leaving out all but constitutional objections, so that all Christians who favor justice can freely sign it. I have had five thousand letters to Senators and representatives printed, urging them to use their influence and vote to secure amendment and repeal of all exemption of church property from taxation.

The work of filling out 5,000 letters and mailing them to all parts of the state is very heavy, but I have labored night and day, and now, if all Liberals will do the little "all they can to help," our success is certain.

Tacoma, Wash.

The Freethought Federation of America.

THE DEBATE WITH BRADEN.

Owing to the somewhat severe and unprecedented snowstorms we have experienced during the past two weeks on this Pacific coast the trains have all been delayed and the Eastern mails have been a few days late. This has prevented me from getting my mail matter as regularly as usual. So friends will please excuse the seeming neglect occasioned by my long delay in answering their correspondence.

I am overjoyed to state that the much talked-of interest manifested by the Freethinkers in the Federation has not relaxed, nor even decreased, in its ardor; but on the contrary, their enthusiasm is still increasing rapidly and perceptibly, and we feel more confident than ever of the great success that will follow our footsteps in the work of the Federation.

Upon my arrival at Barlow, Ore., I found two large packages of letters awaiting me. Among them were letters from friends who were interested in our work and had made application for further instructions concerning our principles and objects. Others contained lists of names for membership, which are causing our roll of members to increase beyond our most sanguine expectations. Others again had large World's Fair petitions inclosed, which have been forwarded to the place where they are needed and likely to do the most good. And again, others of our friends had inclosed a little of the "sinews of war," by which we are alone enabled to keep up our fight against bigotry. Among those who have so generously contributed to our funds are: R. Butterfield, Sacramento, Cal., $5; G. A. Cooper, Nevada City, Cal., $3.50; J. Josephs, Pittsburgh, Pa., $1; L. L. Babbit, Bushnell, Ill., $1. Total, $10.50. We can assure our friends, who have nobly helped us in this movement, that the money given shall be spent in useful work—in the distribution of Freethought literature. We have $100 worth printed for the use of the Federation, and anyone desiring copies of our constitution with blank attached for signatures and other leaflets for free distribution may have the same by applying to me.

The fourth night of my debate opened as usual, but differing from the others inasmuch as I was in the affirmative now, being on the second proposition. I commenced this side of the debate with a criticism and an investigation of the evidences afforded us for the belief in the existence of God. Instead of dealing with my arguments he commenced to read a prepared essay which had no bearing upon the subject at all. He utterly refused to discuss them, telling the audience that "it was his intention to entirely ignore my arguments"—an admission which showed his utter inability to grapple with the proposition we were discussing. He resorted again to the flagrant abuse and conducted himself in such a manner as to receive the sneers and contempt of his audience. He quibbled and squirmed to extricate himself from his unfortunate predicament, but he was on a quagmire and every step taken put him deeper into the "Slough of Despond." He has been well described as a veritable "mud-slinger," and his capacity in that relation is unequaled by any other individual upon the surface of the globe.

He gnashed and ground his teeth with rage and pouted his lips with anger and disdain.

The fifth night was a repetition of the fourth, and his language was too filthy to be described. Its very nauseousness must be its own protection, for few people of decent feelings would like to disturb so foul and so prurient a pool. I hurled back his slanderous abuse at him, which was the means of completely bringing him into submission. On the closing night he uttered the most flagrant falsehoods and base equivocations, which he calls "debating." He then read the copy of a letter challenging me to repeat the debate, which he had given to me a day or so previously, and which I still have in my possession, and give here below:

SEATTLE, WASH., Feb. 1, 1893.

J. R. CHARLESWORTH: Your adherents are already boasting, in Seattle and Tacoma, of the great victory that you are achieving. Such boasts are being sent abroad. To expose the insincerity of such boasting, and to forever end them, and all such false statements as you and the Tacoma Infidels made yesterday to Mr. Dunlap, I hereby challenge you to repeat this debate (in which you are achieving such a victory) in Tacoma, on precisely the same terms as we are now debating in Seattle. That the Ministerial Association in Tacoma do precisely what the Ministerial Association in Seattle did. That you accept it as you did similar action of the Ministerial Association in Seattle. This challenge ends all such boasting and all such false statements as were made to Mr. Dunlap. If you do not accept, in writing, this challenge before the close of the service on Saturday night, February 4th, I will read this communication to the audience and expose your back-out and the back-out of the Tacoma Infidels.

Yours,

CLARK BRADEN.

This letter is sufficient in itself to show the way in which the debate terminated, and which side got the better of it. Observe, that in his ungentlemanly manner he did not even display the common courtesy of addressing me as "Dear Sir," and at this time we were debating together upon the platform. It is needless for me to say that I ignored his "challenge" until he read the above letter to the audience; when I read the following letter to show who wanted to back out of the debate after the first night:

SEATTLE, WASH., Jan. 31, 1893.

J. R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: You will remember that we pledged ourselves to assume the financial responsibility of the debate. Pay the loss if a failure, take the profits if a success.

You may have one hundred dollars to waste as your share of the two hundred dollars it will take to run the debate. I have not.

I propose to accept the inevitable. Adjourn the debate until we are sure of a fair chance to be heard.

If there are men in Seattle who would be so foolish as to pay twenty-five dollars per night for the Armory in such weather as this, I will not be so foolish to stand, shivering in an overcoat, to talk to them, shivering so they cannot hear.

We will not have one hundred out if we attempt to speak to-night. We cannot get an audience together to-night, nor this week. I propose to use common sense. Accept the inevitable. Adjourn until one can figure right and have a chance to succeed. Let us adjourn until the committees can assure us that we have a chance to do something.

1. The weather must be such that people will attend. I will wait until such is the case.

2. The committees attend to their business, and advertise properly. That has not been done.

3. The Armory secured for one week, without interruption.

When this is done, I am ready to go on. But will not before it is done.

I insist that it be done, thoroughly done. And I insist that the debate be resumed—when it is done—without failure.

I want no failure in the debate arrangements. No failure to have the debate.

No failure when it is held in anything connected with it.

Yours, CLARK BRADEN.

I declined to accept his challenge, saying that "I only debated with gentlemen," and I proceeded to read a letter sent to R. J. Wilson, of Seattle, by G. H. Walser, of Liberal, Mo.

As soon as I had mentioned the name of G. H. Walser, this "reverend" gentleman was instantly upon his feet with an objection, saying that the letter was a personal attack, and asked the chairman to rule it out of the debate. He knew what kind of a story it was going to tell. A "guilty conscience requireth no accusing" and his heart trembled before the exposure that was to follow. The chairman, however, ruled it out of the debate, and I was compelled to submit to his ruling, but I announced to my audience that I would read it aloud to them at my lecture the following night. The promise was kept, and I read it, whereat a murmur could be distinctly heard passing through the audience.

The letter spoke of Braden's extradition from Nebraska to Missouri, of his arrest by the sheriff, and his subsequent answer in a criminal court to a charge of felony. This letter tamed the rascal. He almost begged of me to be merciful with him, and asked me not to make the contents of that letter public. The best answer to give him was, "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you." Here was a man who had defamed the memory of every Freethinker he could name, living and dead, and now that he was caught like a rat in a trap, he implored that I should show him mercy. The best mercy that I would show him would be to drive him off the earth. The man is not a debater, he can not even give a fair lecture; all his utterances are read from manuscript, and that is filthy enough, but when he leaves that he becomes worse. At the conclusion of the debate the audience congratulated me upon the success that had been achieved, while the representative of the Ministerial Alliance of Seattle was completely ignored.

Prof. Felix Adler resumed his lecturing in Chickering Hall last Sunday, his subject being "Shall the World's Fair be Opened on Sunday?" The lecture was begun by telling an incident illustrating the questionable methods employed by those who are working to keep the Fair closed on Sunday. In order to understand the question thoroughly, the professor said, it was necessary to know something of the history of the observance of the Sabbath. The custom arose in Chaldea; it was borrowed by the Hebrews, who have transmitted it to the Christians. The Chaldeans were great astronomers, and while they worshiped both the sun and moon they paid especial attention to the latter. It was in accordance with this respect for the moon that it was decreed that the seventh, the fourteenth, the twenty-first, and the twenty-eighth days of the month should be set aside for moon-worship. No work was done on those days from the fear that the moon-god might become angered at man's thus displaying his powers and independence. From the inscriptions we learn that no flesh could be cooked on that day, no medicines administered, and no festive garments worn. "It is the Chaldean element that must be eliminated from the Sabbath, leaving us the American Sabbath, the day of rest and recreation." That there should be one day of rest, the professor said, is an absolute necessity. The directors of the World's Fair have promised that the men who work on Sunday will get a day off during the week. Professor Adler then dwelt on the necessity of opening the Fair on Sunday, and the benefits that would accrue to the people at large. He also spoke of the good that might be accomplished by influential men organizing societies to help reduce the expenses of workingmen who wished to visit the Fair.

Next Sunday Professor Adler will lecture on "Is it true that Virtue is its own reward, and Evil doing its own punishment?"

The meeting-rooms of the Newark Liberal League were well filled last Sunday to listen to an admirable lecture on "Liberty and Morality" by W. S. Bell. Mr. Henry Bird presided as usual. In opening the lecturer said:

"Every human heart loves liberty. With it life may become a joy; but without it life is one prolonged sorrow. We all sigh for liberty. We all struggle for it; it is the thing that the poor and oppressed of all nations pray for. The downtrodden of every country have lightened their burdens by trusting to a coming day of deliverance. The captive and prisoner have soothed their pains by fondly dreaming of liberty. No degradation and oppression have been so great as to extinguish the hope of the human heart. How greatly mankind has been crushed! Slavery of some sort seems always to have been the lot of mankind. A few have always lived off the many. The few who managed to become chiefs or kings got rich. The multitude became toilers and slaves and lived in poverty and wretchedness. The king claimed them bodily as his subjects and as soldiers—to work for him and to go to battle for him whensoever he willed. The priest claimed them as his mental slaves. The poor votary must often visit the sacred temple. He must pray often and sing praises often to the gods for making him a poor miserable being, and must combine songs and praises, lest they should visit him in wrath. He must pay tithes of all he possesses. We can hardly imagine the wretchedness of the slaves in the earlier stages of human existence. If it had not been that the poor wretches knew so little about real happiness, they could not have endured their misery. But the primitiveness or undeveloped character of human nature and its environments produced a stolid and rude people. Their feelings were not keen. They knew nothing about any other conditions than those they were in. It is true they saw the king and priest live in superior conditions, but then they were divine agents—the chosen ones of God. They were divinely commissioned. Thus the poor people have always toiled and slaved for church and state. At times they have protested—have resisted taxation and imposed beliefs, but king and priest have compromised, usually in mere words, while the burdens would remain nearly the same.

The lecturer then spoke on morality. He said that "man's guide—his moral standard, was the consequences of his actions." Among those who spoke after the lecturer were Mr. Parker, Mrs. Smith, Mr. Brill, and Mr. Sexton.

Next Sunday, T. B. Wakeman will lecture on "What the World Owes to Charles Darwin."

A young man's debating club has been started in Newark. Most of the members are Freethinkers, and the subjects debated will always be those likely to interest Freethinkers. At the next meeting, held Saturday evening, March 11th, Mr. Henry will lead the discussion, the subject being "Flowers and their Origin."

Resolutions.

WHEREAS, The Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the state of Minnesota expressly forbid any enactment tending to favor any religion in preference to another, and

WHEREAS, The first day of the week has been set aside by certain religious denominations as their Sabbath day, be it therefore

Resolved, That the members of the Crookston Freethought League believe any and all enactments tending to enforce said Sabbath day are favoring the establishment of religion, and therefore are in violation of said constitutions which we consider the fundamental law of the state and nation, and therefore most emphatically protest against any such legislation either state or national, and be it further

Resolved, That we consider the act of Congress of last year closing the World's Columbian Exposition on Sunday as unconstitutional and condemn the same as a usurpation of the rights of a free and confiding people, and further be it

Resolved, That we look upon the action of the World's Fair committee in not allowing the question of "Sunday opening" to be argued from a constitutional standpoint as despotic and arbitrary, and unworthy the representatives of the American people.

Unanimously adopted by the Crookston Freethought League of Crookston, Minn., Feb. 18, 1898.

OLE E. HAGEN, Secretary.

ELIAS STEENERSON, President.

Minor Mentions.

The revival season is upon us and many backsliders will be stricken down with annuals again.

If the great apostle Paul had married some nice girl who loved him he would not have been half such a crank about women.

The reason why angels do not appear to apostles and ministers nowadays is on account of the chances they would have to take of being wronged.

Never wait for God to do anything for you if you are in a hurry to have it done. It is surer, safer, cheaper, and much more satisfactory all round to do it yourself.

ONE of the things on which they [Jesuits] most prided themselves, was introducing themselves into the houses of the great in their last illness, as ambassadors of God, to open to them the gates of heaven without their previously passing through purgatory. Under Louis XIV. it was considered as having a bad aspect, it was unfashionable and discreditable, to die without having passed through the hands of a Jesuit; and the wretch, immediately after the fatal scene had closed, would go and boast to his devotees that he had just been converting a duke and peer, who, without his protection, would have been inevitably damned. The dying man might say: "By what right, you college excrement, do you intrude yourself on me in my dying moments? Was I ever seen to go to your cells when any of you had the gangrene or fistula, and were about to return your gross and unwieldy bodies to the earth? Has God granted your soul any rights over mine? Do I require a preceptor at the age of seventy? Do you carry the keys of paradise at your girdle? You dare to call yourself an ambassador of God: show me your patent. And if you have none, let me die in peace. No Benedictine, Chartreux, or Premonstrant comes to disturb my dying moments; they have no wish to erect a trophy to their pride upon the bed of our last agony; they remain peacefully in their cells; do you rest quietly in yours; there can be nothing in common between you and me." A comic circumstance occurred on a truly mournful occasion, when an English Jesuit, of the name of Routh, eagerly strove to possess himself of the last hour of the great Montesquieu. "He came," he said, "to bring back that virtuous soul to religion;" as if Montesquieu had not known what religion is better than a Routh; as if it had been the will of God that Montesquieu should think like a Routh! He was driven out of the chamber, and went all over Paris exclaiming, "I have converted that celebrated man; I prevailed upon him to throw his 'Persian Letters' and his 'Spirit of Laws' into the fire." Care was taken to print the narrative of the conversion of President Montesquieu by the reverend father Routh, in the libel entitled "The Anti-Philosophic Dictionary."* — Voltaire.

*We have already observed, that no one ventured to drive him away; he attended at the instant of the death of Montesquieu to steal his papers: in this he was prevented; but he took his revenge on the wine, and was at length carried away dead drunk to his convent.—French Ed.

Letters of Friends.

A Friend Interested, Studious, and Helpful.

MERIDEN, CONN., Jan. 29, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I received your books OK. They are just the thing for people to read that uses a little common sense. I am a believer in Spiritualism, but no Spiritualist because I do not think I am good or perfect enough, but I am trying to do the best I can.

Well, I have said enough, so I will send for three more books. I did not notice them when I sent before or I should have sent in that order. EDWARD M. RADER.

Christians Who Read This Book Will Leave Their Courses.

ANTRIM, N. H., Jan. 29, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have received the Bible Picture Book all right, and it is just what the good Christians should have and read. Then, if there was one particle of shame in them they would turn their attention to something different from what they all practice. For, as one of their tribe said, when he was arraigned before a court for bad conduct with the women of his church, they all do it more or less; and he told the truth and shamed the devil for having one of his children tell the truth about the gang. I distribute all of my papers around, and show the fine passages of their blessed book to them whenever I get a chance. But they do not like to take the same medicine that they want other people to swallow.

Respectfully yours, H. B. RALEIGH.

Matter Did Not Exhibit Mind.

CLARKSVILLE, IA., Feb. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to thank you and others, including Mr. Anderson, for the many excellent articles on the subject of evolution, and desire to say a few words in reply to Mr. Anderson's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 4th. In his former letter of inquiry he is not satisfied because in some particulars there remains to be given a solution that has not been reached. What of that? Does it invalidate the overwhelming mass of testimony to the truth of evolution? What a sweeping declaration Mr. Anderson makes when declaring "that what you have written does not in any degree whatever tend to disprove the existence of an intelligence coeval with matter;" and proceeds, "It seems absurd to think of an unintelligent ocean of matter moving from cycle to cycle and all of this without thought." But does Mr. Anderson show its opposite? Does he show in what manner it is demonstrated that matter in its primary condition evinces intelligence or thought? It is true it yields obedience to mechanical and chemical law, but so far as we know or can apprehend thought, it results from highly organized matter as exhibited on this earth and nowhere else. Thought is an effect and found only in connection with living things. To be told that gravity or mechanics or chemistry is thought in my opinion is absurd. No one will dispute with Mr. Anderson or Raymond that evolution can be set forth with or without affirming or denying divine agency, but the whole implication of evolution forbids and denies any such agency. Certainly Mr. Darwin did not call in the aid of a divine agency or thought, but rather says that life, such as it is and has been, is the result of conditions. "That evolution surely does not controvert the idea of a superintending intelligence." Mr. Anderson ought to have the benefit of his opinion. But the fact is, when one undertakes to account for the way things act in the universe by investing them with intelligent power superior to and distinct from things acted on he is transcending all knowledge and trampling on all deductions of science. Concluding, Mr. Anderson says, "He does not like dynamic." Why not?—perhaps for the same reason the devil is said not to like holy water.

With very much respect I remain,

E. FOWLE.

It Is Time to Rise.

MUKILTEO, WASH., Jan. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I believe the cause for which you are working has no superlative. Surely, what could be more worthy than an act to promote liberty, and further the idea of progression and civilization?

I take pleasure in expressing my sympathy for you, especially in your efforts to have the World's Fair open on Sunday.

Now that the government has usurped its power, violated the Constitution, and dictated to the people of Illinois how they shall spend their Sundays, as shown by their decision regulating the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday; and all this in the face of the best wishes of the enlightened people of the whole country, it follows that it is the duty of every person who loves liberty and country to rise up and protest against such indignities perpetrated against their freedom at the hands of our government officials who are so timid as to allow themselves to be controlled by bigots who revel in superstition, and who take delight and find comfort in following in the footsteps of their barbarian ancestors.

We would further say that a man could do the laboring man, who has no other day than Sunday for study and recreation, no greater injury than to use his vote or influence in such a manner as would deprive him of the benefits to be derived from this wonderful entertainment and series of grand object-lessons afforded by the World's Fair.

For my part I am doing all in my power to help you along in your task, having sent Mr. Putnam a small sum of money, and now am getting subscribers to a petition to Congress praying that the World's Fair shall be opened on Sunday. Our town is but a small place, but I have succeeded in getting the names of almost everyone whom I have asked, including even many church-members.

You will please find inclosed money order for $4, for which please renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also send me a copy of the "Free-thinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in boards. I also wish my name enrolled as a member of the "Freethought Federation of America," for it is through this that I expect grand results. Hoping that success will crown our efforts, I am,

Yours for truth, PETER GRAVELLE.

Some Deep-delving Theories.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Feb. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In your essays on astronomy and design, you seem to base your argument on the time it has taken for our globe to arrive at its present condition upon the assumption that at first it was in a red-hot molten condition, and that it required millions of years to cool it and form a crust before it became in a fit condition for life. At which time most certainly there could be no life upon it. The assumption is a myth to begin with. All that can be said on the subject must be speculation, and no positive knowledge can be obtained by such method of argument.

The Darwinian theory of the origin of species is of the same method of reasoning, requiring untold ages of time to accomplish the feat of changing one species to that of another, with no beginning for primal life, nor no ending of time for its accomplishment.

Why not abandon all theoretical methods of reasoning, since the facts show that no positive knowledge or proof on any subject whatever can be obtained by it, that will be satisfactory to all, and adopt Newton's method by taking some actual phenomena of nature, which she has actually produced, and manifested the operation to our senses, as her ways are uniform and abiding, and the way she produces one thing must be the way she produces all things?

All things are alive when in their native condition. By induction primal matter must be alive, and is composed of only a very few substances in masses, being indestructible and of definite character. Nature, by the law of generation in combining them, shows that they are of the nature of characters, and that in combining, it is only synthesizing subjects the same as the printer does from masses of characters of type, which principle is obtained from nature.

We call the combining process growing. We know that all things on the earth grow when they are alive, and are the product of only a few characters, called elements. Nature's laws being universal, why not all things in nature grow, and a product of a very few primal characters? Which, from their nature, character, and power, and being alive and definite, constitute them cause, law, and all the power there is in the universe to run it, and the entire individual machinery belonging to it.

The behavior of our elements suggests to chemistry that themselves are compounds, even when they are deprived of such material as life, electricity, magnetism, temperature, etc., which are always known to exist in them when in a living organism (machine), and they always display their nature, their character, energy, force, motion, and sufficient power to run all machines known—each machine generating and controlling its own power in the general economy of the whole down to the crystal, the cell, and atom.

In all the elements, both primal and those belonging to our globe and its products, as there is nothing else in the universe, no one, to my knowledge, has ever claimed that of or in themselves there was any intelligence or knowledge to be discovered except in the products of the animal kingdom, which are synthesized subjects a long way off from original characters. In combining our elements, chemistry informs us that they are always constant and consistent in their likes and hates, thus showing their nature and character. The product of their combination is a sequence of their combination. Things have got to be what they are, and there is no help for it. Fate is stamped upon all things. No design in nature is possible, for the reason that the elements of nature alone are the cause and the law governing the universe and all things in it, and they in their native condition are insensate. Believe me,

Yours, etc., GEO. DAVIS.

What Spirits Actually Do.

CAMP ALAMO, LOWER CALIFORNIA, MEX., Jan. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I read in the next to the last issue the article by Mr. C. Severance on Spiritualism. I discover in the long array of misrepresentations one patent truth, and that is, that the truth is not injured by opposition.

One would be led to think from his representations of Spiritualism that a spirit never had been known to announce his or her departure from the body to friends previous to the news reaching the friends by mail or telegram. Now, there is a medium within arm's-length of me this moment who, while on a prospecting trip in Arizona, was informed by his spirit-mother of her demise in Ohio. He had had no correspondence with any of the family for a long time, and was not expecting the event, hence he could not have improvised it in his mind. The intelligence came with such force that he gave up prospecting and proceeded at once to Prescott, where he was told there was a letter awaiting him from one of the family, and that report corresponded in date with the spirit message.

When I resided in Riverside, Cal., I was personally acquainted with a Mrs. Caleph, who was informed of the demise of her mother by the freed spirit at the same hour that it occurred in Minnesota, as she was informed later on by telegram.

I also knew a Mr. Heap, of San Bernardino, who was informed of the departure from earth-life of his father in England—what day a letter would arrive giving the news and all the particulars concerning his father's death. One item which no one would be very likely to conjure up in his mind was that the other heirs to the estate would manage to get in possession of all of the estate and prevent him from getting any of it. All the facts narrated by the spirit-father were found true to the letter, unwelcome as they were.

These three persons I am well acquainted with, and their veracity is at par with all who know them.

Besides, anyone who reads the Spiritualist papers can see recorded every week instances where spirits relate all sorts of facts known to no one on earth at the time.

Mr. Severance's article shows conclusively all the way through that he is not familiar with spirit manifestations of any phase.

He calls spirit phenomena supernatural. Now, I will give a handsome reward to any one of unquestionable veracity who ever heard a veteran Spiritualist speak of the phenomena as supernatural.

It is amusing and disgusting to see those who never attended a séance in their lives attempt to inform the public how spirit phenomena are produced, assume to know all about it, and those who have witnessed phenomena hundreds of times, although they number millions of the best minds, are wholly incapable of judging what they see and hear.

It is the privilege of all who wish, to judge at long range and misrepresent even to the degree of being ridiculous; but we would think there is more wisdom in first investigating a subject before attempting to instruct the world at large on it.

As ever, for truth,

N. A. PICKENS, M.D.

No God Cares for Man.

BELVIDERE, ILL., Feb. 6, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It is well sometimes for a man to try to comprehend, or at least to make some feeble attempt to grasp, some idea about the immensity of space if for no other purpose than to teach him humility, his utter insignificance, and to disabuse his mind of that conceited notion that nature or any higher power ever bends to his self-esteem, his wishes, or his whims, or takes the least notice of him or his affairs whatever. For the purpose of knocking every particle of superfluous self-importance out of each of us let us consider some of the truths of astronomy. We are told by investigators of that science that the star called Sirius is that much larger than this earth that if its inhabitants (if there are any) are as large in proportion to that star as we are to this earth, this earth would only be to them about the size of a common apple; that if this earth was to fall on that star at the feet of one of its inhabitants he might look around in surprise and wonder who threw that stone at him. If he picked it up he might remark how cold it felt at each end and how damp it was on two of its sides; by putting on his spectacles he might notice a little roughness on the skin where the Rocky mountains and Alps are located; with his thumb he would unconsciously wipe out of existence the cities of Chicago, New York, and London. By means of these comparisons we get some notion of the utter insignificance of our planet when compared with countless millions of others that are floating in the immeasurable immensity of space.

To go further, let us try to catch a faint idea of the supposed creator of all the starry host. We have oftentimes been informed that he is omnipresent—that is, his person is boundless—in other words, he fills all space, but as it is impossible to comprehend all space we will only try to imagine his size to be that large that his eye alone is so vast that by placing to it a microscope of a million times greater power than any we possess and looking through it he could but barely discern this mighty Sirius. And yet infinite space is so vast that a million such deities might wander about it forever and never meet each other.

Now, if we were to look into a large room which had been thoroughly cleansed and from which every article of furniture had been removed we would feel justified in saying that there was nothing in it. In like manner it would seem that this great deity (to whom in size the greatest star would be but an invisible speck) would also be justified in saying that there was nothing in existence. To him moving through space with not a star visible to the eye it would still appear necessary to say, "Let there be light." Indeed, it would seem to the eye of deity in looking over the boundless fields of space that no natural law or even nature itself could be in existence. For where could a finger be put on such things as light, heat, force, or the laws of attraction, or in fact any possible law of nature? By reflecting on this subject of unfathomable space, and the immensity of the omnipotent being that is supposed to fill it, our minds irresistibly revolt at the thought and we find it impossible to divest ourselves of the impression that there has been a great mistake made about it. How can an intelligent being of such magnitude exist? And if he did, how could he possibly take any notice of man when it seems impossible that he could take any cognizance of even such mighty orbs as Sirius? If such a being exists, what mammoth gall and impertinence a man must be possessed of who claims to know anything about him. And yet there are such men. Their most ridiculous pretense we can only attribute to egotism, ignorance, knavery. It may be asked, what profit is it for us to thus endeavor to grasp at that which is impossible for us to comprehend? Simply for the reason that we are constantly advised to seek and know this infinit being. By making the attempt we learn the uselessness of the advice. And also to show us that by grasping at a God so large as to be useless we lose our grip of some smaller ones that might have been of more utility. Oh, yes! a lesson we can learn by thus allowing our minds to dwell on this great subject of infinit space and the assertion of an infinit God. By balancing the pros and cons we are compelled to cry, "Oh, this great God is far too big for us; a smaller one would suit our wants and wishes better. Then, O ye clergymen! do tell, have ye a smaller God to give us?"

Hoping that some useful, loving one will soon be found, I remain,

Yours, a truth seeker,

ROBERT SWAIT.

Judicial Decisions Usurping Our Rights.

VAN BUREN, ARK, Feb. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: How plain it is that the decision delivered Feb. 29, 1892, of the United States Supreme Court, making this a religious nation, has ignored the plain words of the Constitution and the maxims of the patriotic framers of the Constitution and our republican form of government.

Before the late war such men as Dallas, Taney, Wright, Clay, Cass, Webster, and a host of others thought the Constitution should be in the reach of every freeman; that it ought to be a text-book in our schools and colleges, and be found in the cabins of the poor as well as in the mansions of the rich; and upon this depended the safety and perpetuity of our freedom; and to this end the Senate of the United States had printed tens of thousands of copies of the Constitution for free delivery, edited and prepared by W. Hickey.

I have the sixth edition before me, and after the dedication of the people, the Congress, the president, and the Supreme Court of the United States, I find these words: "The Constitution in its words is plain and intelligible and is meant for the homebred, unsophisticated understanding of our fellow-citizens. The people alone are the absolute owners and movers of such sovereignty as human beings can claim to exercise—subject to the eternal and unchangeable rules of justice, of truth, and good faith." The moral law is out of its reach, sovereignty cannot violate that and be more justified than the humblest individual. And Thomas Jefferson, at his second inaugural address, said: "In matters of religion I have considered that its free exercise is placed by the Constitution independent of the powers of the general government." This is what the court ought to have said, "That Congress could not prohibit the free exercise of religion." But they went back to the commission of Ferdinand and Isabella, taking us back to the times of the horrid Inquisition, and the bigoted and intolerant colonial times, when they burnt witches and hanged Quakers. By this they have tried to make the Constitution sophistical, and stultified it, taking it out of the range of their fellow-citizens. For all of which I fully believe they should be impeached; and in former times I believe they would have been. The president-elect ought to recommend it in his inaugural.

Spiritualism Again.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Feb. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In touching the subject of Spiritualism again, I would say to A. H. Frank that I did not use the words he quotes to my credit—that I was a Spiritualist only from having been reared by Spiritualist parents. My mind was influenced by them and their positive convictions, the same as it would have been against Spiritualism had they been somatists and used their influence in that direction; but the varied phenomena, of which I have seen much, led me to believe in Spiritualism until reason, observation, and experience forced me to disbelieve that said phenomena were produced by the spirits of dead mortals. I distinctly said I had had years of experience with spirit mediums, and yet A. H. Frank says, "not having investigated the evidences of Spiritualism, my belief had no foundation to rest on." I have seen many of the best and most noted mediums between Boston and San Francisco, and never failed when floating around the country, to attend a Spiritualist séance or have a private interview with some medium, when I had a dollar in my pocket. I have seen all the phenomena Mr. Frank refers to, and once had the privilege of embracing the fair but firm form of a "materialized" female spirit, whose breath from the other shore indicated garlies for supper, or a bad case of indigestion. No, I have not risen to deny the existence of phenomena, but to state a disbelief in the causes claimed for the effects; for I hold that the free expression of individual opinion is the equal right of the doubter as well as the believer. The immortality of the soul—that is, the vital force that animates the body, has ever been an open question, and is such to-day; for all men are not Spiritualists, nor believers through faith in the continuity of consciousness. When the whole world is convinced one way or the other, then doubt and discussion will cease, and not before.

It is a favorite style of discussion with Spiritualists to bring in the weight of great names, and Hare, Crookes, Wallace, Zöllner, etc., have been utilized so often for that purpose they have become what is termed in vulgar parlance, chestnuts. All great men—great only in comparison—have their weaknesses, and the belief in Spiritualism may be theirs for aught I know to the contrary. However, if the names of great men are arguments the other side might introduce a few, like Bradlaugh, Büchner, Huxley, Ingersoll, etc. But the question would not then be settled, so great names should not come between the conflict of facts, which must ultimately reveal the living truth. I much doubt whether the time will ever come when a dying man will depart any different than did Voltaire, by "a leap in the dark;" for absolute knowledge of another world and another life has never been demonstrated; and faith plays an important part even in Spiritualism. All the Spiritualists I ever knew were continually running after tests, and presumably to bolster up their belief; for convictions seem to weaken in many cases, as a Methodist backslides when he gets out of the influences that roused his emotional insanity and made of him a convert. Spiritualists do not see spirits nor a spirit world, consequently they believe in them and it, through faith, engendered by phenomena that work upon the five senses. What a "spirit" is composed of or a spirit world, no Spiritualist can tell, though they talk learnedly of "sublimated matter" that is indestructible, being a different kind, if so, than the matter that composes our physical bodies. Then back of this sublimated matter is something else, they tell us, and that is the "soul," which animates the spirit body and is utterly invisible in the spirit world, as it was when occupying a body of flesh and blood in this one. Asked to define the composition of the soul, and they wisely declare it to be a "principle," and there they stop and leave us with a word that conveys no meaning to the senses, for back of "sublimated matter" even the imagination cannot go without running into nothing, and nothing is a very poor composition for a soul that thinks, moves, and inherits consciousness. "Gross and tangible matter" is a term much used by the spiritual-minded, and many of these people with lofty conceptions of a soul and its destiny really profess to despise the body that nature has here given them and think eternal, unalloyed happiness will eventually be attained by passing into a spiritual body that shall constantly become more and more eternal, until somewhere out in the limits of space, far, far from this ball of earth, their little cup of joy will bubble over, and what there is left of them will go on "progressing" until the end of time and a while after. This is Spiritualism, and it is proved by "phenomena that cannot be explained on any other basis than that of spirit communion," we are told.

Well, I once believed this nonsense of life eternal, of consciousness everlasting in an ethereal body like unto, in shape, the one I now feed and clothe; but reason has rejected it as too improbable for belief, and now I not only think, but expect, that consciousness will expire with the body that made its existence possible.

It is said that one can be too skeptical as well as too credulous, but credulity has always led the human race into error, and has ever predominated over skepticism. Spiritualism opens up a fine field for credulity, and Spiritualists are, as a rule, just as credulous as a Catholic devotee, each swallowing about the same amount of nonsense, only of different kinds. Catholics believe in devils, and Spiritualists in obsessing spirits, and I once knew a very intelligent woman, on subjects pertaining to this world, who used to burn coffee to drive out from the house "dark spirits." And she would use language more violent than complimentary when holding audible but one-sided conversation with them, as she often did. Her nervous system was in a disordered state from excesses not spiritual, and it required little to bring on hysteric conditions, when dark spirits were considered the cause. The nervous system is, as everybody knows, a most delicate and complicated affair, and I do not believe that a single case of so-called obsession ever occurred to a person whose nervous system was in every way sound and healthy. Some of the worst physical wrecks I have ever met were spirit mediums, and when hysterics and epileptic fits are considered desirable I should say mediumship would be.

P. B. Randolph, the noted author and erratic genius whose name was once most prominent in the movement of Spiritualism, left these words on record when his mind was in the zenith of its power, and long before he ended his own existence: "I turn with loathing and horror from the bare recollection, even, of my mediumship."

Whatever mediumship is, one thing is certain, the mind is seldom in a normal or healthy condition, and to follow that vocation is to be unfitted for any other. Erratic, discordant, inharmonious, and unsettled is the state of mind that attends mediumship, and if "mediumship as a revelative power is worthless," as Randolph declared, it is hardly worth the penalty to be a medium. Mr. Frank asks, "How are plants, minerals, birds, and small animals brought long distances and into a closed room?" I do not know. But for a hazardous guess should say, in your mind—same as Noah brought the animals for the ark. But I will call up P. B. Randolph, who was once a medium. His written words are these: "Jugglery has been so systematized in these days that not more than one so-called physical manifestation in fifty is to be relied on for what they purport to be." Moral: Do not believe too readily or too much.

While ready to admit that phenomena are produced and do occur that I cannot explain, some one else may later on, so I see no necessity to pronounce judgment at once by saying, "Spirits do it." It is said that "by the aid of concave mirrors a figure can be projected upon the air so perfectly that one would swear it was a real person standing there and not an image." Moral No. 2: Do not swear too soon.

I will now ask Mr. Frank a question. On July 14, 1884, a young lady was hypnotized in Paris and told: "On Jan. 1, 1885, at 10 A.M., you will see me. I shall come to wish you a Happy New Year. After that is done I shall immediately disappear." On New Year's day these two persons were separated by many miles and no other person knew anything of this hypnotic arrangement; still she told several persons that this party knocked at her door that day, came into the room, wished her a Happy New Year, and to her surprise disappeared. Query: Was she the victim of an illusion of the senses or did she see what Spiritualists would call a ghost?

When a boy I had the cold chills of fear run over me many times from reading Robert Dale Owen's "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," but to-day I believe those terrifying tales, when true, to have been founded on illusions of the senses, produced in what manner I do not know; and all the ghosts that ever haunted the imagination of mortal man I believe to have been the product of his own disordered or hypnotized brain. Unconscious hypnotism, at a distance from the operator, without previous agreement, is an established fact, and when we consider the multiplicity of forces at work of which we know little and understand less, it is not necessary to create an imaginary world peopled with spooks to account for the mysterious or the seemingly marvelous. To place a spirit, unseen and invisible, back of that not clearly understood is genuine nonsense, and credulity should be restrained by those who recognize the value of reason.

Mr. Frank tells us Edison is a medium, and somebody has discovered that Shakspeare was; but it is generally understood that Edison is a Theosophist—whatever that is—and the report of his mediumship needs confirmation. Many Spiritualists seem to consider all men as mentally equal, and where a man towers above his fellows in art, science, or literature, he is a "medium" every time. Ingersoll has been included with "our brother Jesus" among the mediums and I learn that he could never write and speak as he does if not aided by the "invisibles." He is to be congratulated on such able assistance. I have a friend born with the gift of oratory the same as I was born with the faculty of sawing wood, and he recently delivered such a torrent of eloquence in an address prepared for the occasion that a good sister who believes in the "invisibles" rushed up and congratulated him, saying: "You needn't deny it any more. I saw 'em all around you!"

It is an easy matter to claim that Professor Morse had spirit help in the invention of telegraphy, but a little proof is always satisfactory in such cases.

I am ready to believe all inventions and scientific discoveries are due to "spirits" when the existence of spirits is established, and men with no taste or talents for science or inventions are the ones who make the discoveries. Every genius in art, science, or literature has been a product of nature, and spirits have had about as much to do with them as they have in finding Charley Ross or saving the supposed dead from premature burials.

Randolph said that "the agency of the higher class of spirits ceased with the demonstration of human existence beyond the grave, and whatever of lying and boasting followed or follows thereafter, must be set down to the private account either of spiritual or vainglorious or half-demented mediums." I dislike to expose contradictions from a spiritual source, but it seems necessary when too much credit is bestowed on spirits. By the way, spirits, mediums, Spiritualists, and all who know, are still disputing among themselves as to the existence of animals in the spirit world; and latest reports showed that they stood just where they did twenty years ago; some affirming with force and fervor that they do, and some asserting with vigor and vehemence that they do not, but are annihilated at death, as God tells us through Solomon.

When they have settled this important question among themselves, I hope they will make renewed and successful efforts to convince the world that the spirit of man goeth upward and liveth forever. Meanwhile, as I wait for the evidence, I must continue to believe that when the vital force which animates our bodies of flesh and blood is extinct, mental activity will cease forever, and consciousness depart as mysteriously as it came.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Flowers in Winter.

O pinks and roses fair and gay,
How bright you smile this winter day!
Violets too, of azure hue,
Look up, as if they almost knew
Their fragrance sweet would cheer and grace
The very lowliest dwelling-place.

O daisies modest as the spring,
What good and gracious thoughts you bring!
And hyacinths and lily-bells,
You breathe of springtime's grassy dells,
When soft and warm the sun will shine
And lift to life the flower and vine.

Nestled within your bed of green,
So beautiful in lustrous sheen,
O flowers with palpitating life,
With joys complete and blessings rife,
You chase all cares and griefs away
And winter clothe with charms of May.

Still bud and bloom, O flowers bright,
Like thoughts of infants, pure and white!
In hearts and homes both far and near Leave thy glad brightness and good cheer;
Thy thousand tongues with word and smile
Shall many weary hours beguile.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

What Is Patriotism?

Very few of us are willing to agree with the Frenchman who said, "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel," but it is beginning to dawn upon us that the term is far too often misapplied. So often now we hear men who gave their services to their country in the war branded as unpatriotic by men who stayed at home. Why? Because the critic oversteps the boundary of common sense and refuses to recognize the difference between patriotism and fanaticism.

If that sort of patriotism had existed among our forefathers in 1776 monarchical government could not have been surpassed and republican government must never have been given life by the Anglo-Saxons of America. Patriotism is the noblest of man's social attributes, but this is not patriotism but rank prejudice, and is at least un-American. Where we find that inestimable quality degraded to the common level of unauthorized exaggeration and petty prejudice we feel obliged to protest against such wanton use and abuse of the term.

England has better ships than we; France grander and nobler works of art, but is it unpatriotic to recognize the superiority of any country in any manner over ourselves? We protest we are freer than any other country, but Pinkerton hirelings are still maintained; equal in culture and in refinement, but our internal troubles contradict and dispute the statement.

If Americans are so loyal to their religion and country as to refuse opening the World's Fair on Sunday, why should they not maintain the rights of each and every citizen? We look back with horror on the bloody deeds of the Dark Ages, but what can be said in honor of a country that permitted a negro citizen unprotected, untried, and unconvicted to be burnt—all this in liberal, civilized America? Can any term too strongly attack such acts in a Christian land?

Before we pose as a grand success in the republican form of government and thereby render ourselves the laughing-stock of monarchical Europe, let us render ourselves safe from the critic. Let us make a repetition of such affairs as the Homestead riot, the New Orleans lynching, and the recent disgusting atrocity in Paris, Tex., impossible. National pride must not descend to the level of local infatuation!

Let every man honor the flag that has given him life and liberty, home and happiness. Let him ever feel grateful to the men who made, defended, and increased his country. Let him stand ready to shoulder his musket, draw his sword, or freely lay his best services on the altar of his country's need. Such a man as this is a patriot deserving of all praise, a worthy exponent of the grandest sort of patriotism.

Let us think deeply, do much for the bettering of our country, and say little. Let us not condemn every man who knows a little more than we, be he American or foreigner, as an infidel and traitor, irreverent and unpatriotic. Much must be done, and very soon, to restore our country to its old standing as "the land of the free."

Finally, giving our best to our country and to the world, each doing his or her share, none shirking, traitors shall cease to exist. When we have given our best services let us leave it to posterity to define Patriotism.

In concluding such an article it may be well to add that this composition was drawn forth by a hotly discussed question on the merits and superiority of America and Americanisms over the rest of the world, and the writer has tried to answer the contending points.

Legend—Continued.

"Oh, what a fearful winter," said Ravy, as he came in with $2 for the children. Seth caressed, and held him close to the small fire. "Frosty nights shall never find you in the tree again; but when the sweetbrier blooms, 'whose scent could wake the dead,' we will inhale her breath there, early in the morning, while the balmy breeze bathes our heated brows."

I hear a great deal about charity. The beloved mayor and the public are disposed to be kind and generous, but the deathly clutch of the church keeps me hungry and emaciated. They even say that Ravy is a member of the high church, and that I must go there for flour, and not "cast a slur" on so holy a congregation. I went humbly to the elect for provisions, and they drove me back to Ravy.

"Roast and eat the little fiend," they said, "I prefer him, even if he is a devil, to the one who made him. What influence had the clergy to help the freezing and starving poor, until the mayor aroused pity and piety enough (or something better) to prevent a famine? Christian intrigue reveals the working and wreathing of vipers which cluster around the pedestal of the statue of Mammon—the god of this world—whose Christian piety is the poisonous breath which exhales from the den of the cockatrice.

These Mammon-worshippers, wrapped in fur, meet you as you freeze along the street, refusing the well-known, industrious poor a little money. Oh, God, are such beings saints, future angels, or are they hyenas, crocodiles, hypocrites? Gold and jewels nestle in the partly finished world; the moral of saints are loathsome in decay, instead of unfolding slowly a great and lovely principle. "Orthodox angels, come not near us," said Seth. They say we are apes, great in feeling, but without mental exercise; they can do anything but stoop, as Felix in "Faust" might have said or intimated. Kelso tells us to follow nature, which would cause our hearts to be very hard and depraved sometimes. "Oh, have mercy," said the archbishop, coming in; "shall I help you from my little store?" "Have mercy yourself," Seth answered. "The clergy are dying of fatigue. Do you care? Your great machine is beautiful. Does that comfort the fainting heart? One jewel from the zone of a madonna would support a poor family for a winter."

"And now," added Seth, "to shut the gates of the Fair, a fierce bomb is thrown among us by religion. New heavens and hells are constructed, so that holiness can live like the angels. Swedenborg remarks that God gives them their board and lodging gratis, surrounded with stained glass and things.

"God and his universe have not done much more than a gorilla village, where the one that snatches the most plunder is the greatest man.

"Even the savage who builds the finest hut expects, of course, to share it with his neighbors." Said Seth: "If it was not for Mammon I should receive enough for my work to buy me an overcoat.

"I have lived purely on the edge of another sphere, nature or no nature. I do not think self-indulgence brings happiness. A stern duty always carries a fragrant sense of beauty in its breast. Death is the highest point of life. Are you dying?"

Borrow Montaigne's pillow of flowers. Its name is not 'fear.' Your life has been holy." Seth raised his lustrous eyes; his marble brow became paler. "O death where is thy sting, O grave where is thy victory? Christ cannot improve and save us. We must do it ourselves."

EDNA H.—You have the true poetic gift. Your poem will appear soon. The sentiment is fine.

U. J.—"The Queen" is good, but you can do better than that. No time to write, am always in a hurry.

G. J. R.—All you send to the Corner is good. The interesting bit of history will appear soon. Many thanks for your kindness.

JOHNNY B.—Try to live so that you would not be ashamed for anyone to see all your motives as well as acts, and do as nearly right as possible.

SALLY G.—You ask if he can be a true friend who pictures your faults in company, thus holding you up to ridicule. We should not so regard one. Have little to do with such a person.

GERALDINE AND PORTIA B.—Thank you for the beautiful dolly. It is lovely, and we shall always remember the dear little fingers that embroidered it so finely. The drawn work is done elegantly.

E. DOS S.—Thanks for Port-of-Spain Gazette, in which we note your embarkation in business. We wish you great success and prosperity, and hope you will continue to remember our Corner, where you are always welcome.

Correspondence.

PAULINA, ORE., Jan. 30, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner. I am a boy eleven years old. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I like to read the Corner. I live on a farm, and go to school in the summer. We have a good teacher and like him very much. I guess I will close, wishing good luck to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, OTTO HARDISTY.

SELLWOOD, ORE., Feb. 1, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought that as it was near recess, and as I had my work done, I would write to you. This is my first letter to the Children's Corner. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Corner. My name is Roy Yount, and I am eleven years old. I have a little brother whose name is Frankie Yount. I will close, hoping to see this in print. I remain, Your friend,

ROY YOUNT.

[A very good letter for the first, and may it not be the last from our new friend.—Ed. C. C.]

SAN JACINTO, CAL., Feb. 2, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Children's Corner. It is a pleasure to me to read the letters of this Corner. We have been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for about three years. It has been raining here for the last three days; but is quite pleasant to-day. The snow in the mountains is very beautiful. We live about thirty miles from Strawberry valley, which is a large summer resort. This valley is about six thousand feet above sea level, among the pine trees of the San Jacinto mountains. We have a Dunkard church here. I go almost every Sunday; but not for religion. I would like for some of the Liberal readers of this Corner to correspond with me. If this letter escapes the wastebasket, I will write again.

Your Liberal friend,

HATTIE L. CLARK.

CAPMUS, KAN., Feb. 8, 1893.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I will now make my first effort to write to you and the Cornerites. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I can remember, and I am eighteen years of age. We also have the "Pictorial Text-Book," the Bible Pictures, and pamphlets, the works of Liberalism, too numerous to mention. Well, I am going to school this winter. Our teacher's name is Cora Rice.

She does not belong to the church, but the family she boards with is very pious, and she dare not express her opinion. I lent her a lecture by Helen H. Gardner, entitled "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." She saw there were many good points about it. Religion has a lot much of a grasp in this locality in which I live. Well, as this is the first time I have written to the Corner I will write no more for the present.

Yours for truth and liberty,
Geo. C. Smith.

REVERE, MASS., Feb. 6, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I heard something yesterday that I thought would interest the readers of the Children's Corner.

One of my Catholic playmates told me she was going to have the priest bless her throat to prevent its being sore (and she was going to buy a five-cent package of cough drops to make the blessing more effectual).

Since I wrote to the Corner I have had a double promotion. I study arithmetic, reading, writing, geography, drawing, history, and physiology. I do not like physiology very well.

I received twenty-seven Christmas presents; among them were a large doll, two boxes of stationery, a pink feather fan, two nice books, and a bottle of perfumery.

I am glad you returned from Europe safely. I enjoyed your letters very much.

Mamma and I would like to have you come to Revere some time. It only takes forty minutes, when the cars are on time.

My schoolteacher is a Liberal, and another in the same building is a Catholic. One of my school friends asked me where my teacher went to church, and I told her she did not go anywhere. She said, "Why, it seems so funny not to go to church." She had been brought up to go regularly. Good-bye.

MABEL F. WASHBURN.

[We are always pleased to get a letter from Mabel, the sensible little daughter of the editor of the Boston Investigator, and hope she will write often to the Corner.—Ed. C. C.]

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicereigns of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Mother of Harlots; a Synopsis of Popery, as it Was and as it Is. By William Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. The object of this book is to expose popery, acquaint the people of the country with the dangerous machinations of the church in the United States, and warn them against giving it any countenance or support. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during a residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed. A lecture by the Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not marry. Price, paper, 15 cents.

Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures Respecting New Hall Convent, Boreham, Essex, England. Showing that convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom. Price, paper, 10 cents.

Hard Knocks
at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject.

In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stipiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.

Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.

Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have fostered Learning; Her Attitude towards Continence even more ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism.

Gems of Thought.

REASON and truth should be more regarded by us than vulgar opinion.—Cicero.

DEATH, that word which makes the vulgar shrink, does not harm us, for as long as we are alive it is not death, and when it is death we are no longer alive.—Epicurus.

I HAVE never known one who could bear criticism, who could not be flattered, who would not bribe his judge, or was content that the truth should be loved always better than himself.—Thoreau.

THE moral law can pitch its tents quite as well, if not better, on the new territory of a natural order of the universe left open by science, than on the old one of religion and of belief in spirits.—Buchner.

For many centuries the theologians have taught that an unbeliever—an infidel—one who spoke or wrote against their creeds, could not meet death with composure; that in his last moments God would fill his conscience with the serpents of remorse. For a thousand years the clergy have manufactured the facts to fit this theory.—Ingersoll.

THERE is no appearance that the first principles of things will ever be well understood. The mice which inhabit some little holes of an immense building know not if that building is eternal, nor who was its architect, nor why that architect built. They try to preserve their lives, to people their holes, and to escape the destructive animals that pursue them. We are mice, and the divine architect who has built this universe has not yet, as far as I know, told his secret to any of us.—Voltaire.

THE great work of Darwin was to point out the main process through which the evolution of forms takes place. More organisms come into life than the means of subsistence can support. This leads to a struggle for existence. There is some variety in the forms of individuals of each species of plants and animals, and those possessing the variations most suited to their conditions are enabled to survive, while those less adapted to the circumstances perish. This is called the survival of the fittest. These individuals reproduce in their offspring the variations that have benefited them, and new variations occur, those that are useful being perpetuated. Thus there is a continual divergence from the parent stock, wherever there is a change of surrounding conditions that makes variations serviceable to existence. When these variations are long continued they form new species. But where there is no change in the circumstances of life, and the means of existence are abundant, there is little or no change in the forms of life. This process by which nature selects the forms best suited to their surroundings is called by Darwin NATURAL SELECTION.—Robt. C. Adams.

WE believe—and when we say "we" we mean all persons with any pretensions to education or intelligence—in evolution as applied to the physical history of our globe. We believe that it passed through successive stages or phases, each of which prepared the way for the one following. "Evolution," says Professor Le Conte, "is the central idea of geology. It is this idea alone which makes geology a distinct science. This is the cohesive principle which unites and gives cohesion to all the scattered facts of geology; which cements what would otherwise be a mere incoherent pile of rubbish into a solid and substantial edifice." That the Silurian age passed naturally into the Devonian, which served as a transition to the Carboniferous, no one who has given any thought to the subject for a moment doubts. The trouble arises when it is proposed to consider successive animal species as genetically connected. The scientific world at large has no difficulty in framing the conception or in adopting the idea, but to a few scientific men and a multitude of non-scientific persons there is impiety in the suggestion that one animal species—or one plant species, for that matter—could possibly have passed into or given birth to another. The creation of species was an office which their theology had reserved for a supernatural being, and they cannot assign to natural causes or processes the honor of introducing to existence so much as the tiniest parasite. Whatever is most hideous, uncouth, destructive, and loathsome in the animal kingdom must be regarded as the special and intentional production of divine wisdom no less than the noblest forms of life. None the less do men set themselves to destroy whatever in creation they find hurtful or inconvenient; in practically dealing with plants and animals they ask—not, "Did divine wisdom create it for a wise purpose?" but, "Does it suit our interests to allow it to exist?"—Professor Youmans.

News of the Week.

MRS. WM. WILBUR, of Rowan, Ia., has been driven insane by a description of hell in a sermon.

THE archbishops and bishops of Brazil have issued a joint letter, emphatic in its tone, in favor of the restoration of the temporal sovereignty of the Holy See.

In opposition to the attempt of Premier Wekerle of Hungary to pass a bill making civil marriage sufficient in law, the bishops have issued manifestoes denouncing the proposed law as contrary to the law of God.

THE choice of Judge Gresham as secretary of state has received the approval both of Democrats and of Republicans. Gresham has ever been a terror to dishonest railroad manipulators. He has been dubbed "the defender of the people." He brooks no dishonesty in politics. He is a Freethinker, and the personal friend of Colonel Ingersoll.

THE passing by the Senate of a bill allowing Russia to extradite political offenders from the United States is exciting censure. John Swinton, for instance, says that the extradition treaty is "the most rascally and abominable ever drawn." It would establish a czar in America, and consign to prison many noble patriots, enemies of despotism.

THE Methodists on applying for space at the Fair learned that they could have but 400 square feet, while the Catholics had been assigned 20,000. The Methodists claim that their application was in before that of the Catholics. They are indignant, and say they probably will not exhibit. They add: "The 20,000 square feet does not represent all the space given to the Catholics. That is for their educational exhibit only. They have space for other shows."

POSTMASTER-GENERAL WANAMAKER made a trial of the pneumatic tube for the transit of mail on the 17th ult. The first object transmitted was a Bible, wrapped in an American flag, with the message: "First use of the first pneumatic postal tube in the United States is to send through it a copy of the holy scripture, the greatest message ever given to the world. Covering the Bible is the American flag, the emblem of Freedom of sixty-five million happy people."

THE latest proclamation of the Holy Congregation of the Propaganda at Rome to the clergy of the United States opens: "The supreme pontiff has many reasons of sadness on account of the distresses which the innumerable endeavors of wicked men are trying to bring upon Christianity, especially in Europe. On the other hand, it is a great consolation to him to see the increase of Catholicism, with God's aid, elsewhere in the world. This is especially true of the great republic, for where, scarcely a century ago, there was hardly a vestige of Catholicity, we see now everywhere the church flourishing."

THE annexation of Hawaii is being discussed for and against. The objectors say that it could not be received into the Union as a self-governing state, equal to the other states, but as "a far-away dependency, would have to be ruled by a consul—a strange and dangerous anomaly in our political system, an inexhaustible source of tyranny, profligacy, and corruption, the beginning of radical changes in our free institutions." Again, urge these opposers: "We are told that the Hawaiian islands would be a splendid station for our navy, and give it great facilities in those important waters. Granted. But is it not worth while to consider that if we get such outlying posts for our navy we must build a navy large enough to protect the outlying posts, and that, while we are unassailably strong in our continental home, every far-away possession will be a vulnerable point, an element of weakness?"

AN interesting question recently came up before Justice Dykeman in the supreme court at White Plains, N. Y. Rev. Mr. Daniel S. Toy has been requested by authorities to give some evidence in an important suit. When the minister refused Lawyer A. N. Mayer made an application before Justice Dykeman to compel Mr. Toy to testify. The motion was opposed by Lawyer D. H. Hunt, who said Mr. Toy would not testify because the evidence he had was in the form of a confession and was protected by Matt. xviii, 15, which has been adopted by the Baptist church as a rule of discipline. Judge Dykeman denied the motion of Lawyer Mayer, under section 833 of the code of civil procedure, which says: "A clergyman or other minister of religion shall not be compelled to disclose a confession made to him in his professional character, in the course of discipline enjoined by the rules of practice of the religious body to which he belongs."

The True Ground of Right and Wrong.

Among the tasks on which science is entering, one of the most vital is that of showing to the people the true ground of morality. It must make clear to the whole of the race, as it has already to some, the true cause why we call certain acts right and others wrong—must distinctly point out the reason for doing right, the source of the feeling of ought.

The attempts to do this that have been made by Christians will all be found on examination to be futile. The elucidations essayed by theological writers are on analysis seen to be but random collections of words to which no definite meaning can be attached. The late encyclicals of the pope on the labor question, so lauded as blessed and illuminating deliverances of divine wisdom, are but instances of this sort.

The object of this article is to introduce a short piece of reasoning from our great luminary Herbert Spencer in which he shows that the relations of right and wrong rest not on any of the misty supports which unscientific writers have alleged, but on natural connections of cause and effect. Conduct, he says, is good or bad according as its aggregate results, to self or others, or both, are pleasurable or painful. He dissects, and shows the falsity of, the old notions that wrong is perceived to be wrong by divine revelation, or legal enactment, or inborn intuition.

In exploding the first, the notion of supernatural determination of morals, he chooses as a typical case for his opposition the affirmation of Jonathan Dymond, a Quaker, in his "Principles of Morality:" "The authority of the deity [is] the sole ground of duty, and his communicated will the only ultimate standard of right and wrong."

Coming to the second of the above doctrines which he sets himself to overthrow, to the effect that moral distinctions depend on legal enactment, Mr. Spencer precludes: "Following Plato and Aristotle, who make state enactments the sources of right and wrong, and following Hobbes, who holds that there can be neither justice nor injustice till a regularly constituted coercive power exists to issue and enforce commands, not a few modern thinkers hold that there is no other origin for good and bad in conduct than law." The illustriousness of Hobbes, as a modern writer who, though erring on this one point, on the whole possesses very great force and value, makes it worth while to give his position in his own words:

"Where no covenant hath preceded, there hath no right been transferred, and every man has right to do everything; and consequently no action can be unjust. But when a covenant is made, then to break it is unjust; and the definition of INJUSTICE is no other than the not performance of covenant. And whatsoever is not unjust is just. . . . Therefore, before the names of just and unjust can have place, there must be some coercive power to compel men equally to the performance of their covenants, by the terror of some punishment greater than the benefit they expect by the breach of their covenant" (Leviathan xv).

These two views, along with that of the intuitionists, are satisfyingly shown to be fallacious. The latter part of the reasoning against these views, which moreover introduces what Mr. Spencer considers the true conception, we will present in the original language: "If, by tying its main artery, we stop most of the blood going to a limb, then, for as long as the limb performs its function, those parts which are called into play must be wasted faster than they are repaired; whence eventual disablement. The relation between due receipt of nutritive matters through its arteries and due discharge of its duties by the limb is a part of the physical order. If, instead of cutting off the supply to a particular limb, we bleed the patient largely, so draining away the materials needed for repairing not one limb but all limbs, and not limbs only but viscera, there results both a muscular debility and enfeeblement of the vital functions. Here, again, cause and effect are necessarily related. The mischief that results from great depletion results apart from any divine command, or political enactment, or moral intuition. Now advance a step. Suppose the man to be prevented from taking in enough of the solid and liquid food containing those substances continually abstracted from his blood in repairing his tissues: suppose he has cancer of the esophagus and cannot swallow—what happens? By this indirect depletion, as by direct depletion, he is inevitably made incapable of performing the actions of one in health. In this case, as in the other cases, the connection between cause and effect is one that cannot be established or altered by any authority external to the phenomena themselves. Again, let us say that instead of being stopped after passing his mouth, that which he would swallow is stopped before reaching his mouth; so that day after day he is required to waste his tissues in getting food, and day after day the food he has got to meet this waste he is forcibly prevented from eating. As before, the progress toward death by starvation is inevitable—the connection between acts and effects is independent of any alleged theological or political authority. And similarly if, being forced by the whip to labor, no adequate return in food is supplied to him, there are equally certain evils, equally independent of sacred or secular enactment. Pass now to those actions more commonly thought of as the occasions for rules of conduct. Let us assume the man to be continually robbed of that which was given him in exchange for his labor, and by which he was to make up for nerve-muscular expenditure and renew his powers. No less than before is the connection between conduct and consequence rooted in the constitution of things; unchangeable by state-made law, and not needing establishment by empirical generalization. If the action by which the man is affected is a stage further away from the results, or produces results of a less decisive kind, still we see the same basis for morality in the physical order. Imagine that payment for his services is made partly in bad coin, or that it is delayed beyond the date agreed upon, or that what he buys to eat is adulterated with innutritive matter. Manifestly, by any of these deeds which we condemn as unjust, and which are punished by law, there is, as before, an interference with the normal adjustment of physiological repair to physiological waste. Nor is it otherwise when we pass to kinds of conduct still more remotely operative. If he is hindered from enforcing his claim, if a bribed judge gives a verdict contrary to evidence, or if a witness swears falsely, have not these deeds, though they affect him more indirectly, the same original cause for their wrongness? Even with actions which work diffused and indefinite mischiefs it is the same. Suppose that the man, instead of being dealt with fraudulently, is calumniated. There is, as before, a hindrance to the carrying on of life-sustaining activities, for the loss of character detrimentally affects his business. Nor is this all. The mental depression caused partially incapacitates him for energetic activity, and perhaps brings on ill-health. So that maliciously or carelessly propagating false statements tends both to diminish his life and to diminish his ability to maintain life. Hence its flagitiousness. Moreover, if we trace to their ultimate ramifications the effects wrought by any of these acts which morality called intuitively reprobates; if we ask what results, not to the individual himself only, but also to his belongings; if we observe how impoverishment hinders the rearing of his children, by entailing underfeeding or inadequate clothing, resulting perhaps in the death of some and the constitutional injury of others—we see that, by the necessary connections of things, these acts, besides tending primarily to lower the life of the individual aggressed upon, tend, secondarily, to lower the lives of all his family, and, thirdly, to lower the life of society at large, which is damaged by whatever damages its units."

Here in the last few lines we have been led to a point slightly different from the main theme, viz., the interdependence of society—the truth that what injures one injures all. If Leo XIII. had said in his encyclicals that we must see to it that the workman gets his due, not because of any of the folderol considerations which he did assign, but because the worker if underpaid will remain ignorant and unhealthy, and by his misvoting and contagions injure us—if he had said this his deliverance would have possessed some worth.

The above is but a glimpse of the whole great question of morality. We hope in future issues to do more in exposition of this important subject.

Mohammedanism vs. Christianity.

An attempt to plant Mohammedanism in this country is being made. Mr. Alexander Russell Webb, formerly United States consul at Manila, has embraced that religion, and returned to New York to "establish a Mohammedan paper, to publish books that will educate Americans into a knowledge of Islam as it is, and to organize circles for the study of the Koran and of Islam in general."

In the lands where this religion of Islam, or Mohammedanism, prevails, polygamy is practiced. On this institution Mr. Webb makes some remarks worthy of weighing:

"Polygamy is the idea uppermost in the minds of Americans when Mohammedanism is mentioned. Our American idea of polygamy is got from the Mormons. We think that it means for a man to marry as many wives as he pleases, and that naturally fills us with disgust.

"You must remember, in the first place, that Mohammed found the Arabs marrying as many wives as they chose. He cut down the number so that they could marry one, two, three, or four wives, according to circumstances. I am not foolish enough to suppose that polygamy could be engrafted upon our system of civilization. But you must know that prostitution does not exist in purely Mohammedan countries. In India, where the English are, the Christian English government sets aside on its official Indian budget each year a certain sum for providing prostitutes for the army. I did not believe this when I first heard it, but I looked into it and found that it was true.

"The harem is not an institution created by Mohammed, nor is the custom of keeping the women in seclusion a part of his system. He taught that women should dress modestly, and this precept has been carried to the extreme through the adopting of an Indian custom. In an Oriental city I lectured before about fifty Mohammedan women. They were separated from me by a screen and I could not see them. I lectured upon the customs of English and American society about women. They could all speak and understand English. As I heard afterward, they were terrified and scandalized by what I told them about the way our women went about the streets. The Mohammedan women are well content, and regard their Western sisters with fully as much pity and horror as their Western sisters have for them. And furthermore, I know that their rights are as well protected as are the rights of our women."

The above is very suggestive. Our system of sexual regulation is thought by many of us the most perfect thing in the world. To these persons of local prejudice and narrow knowledge nothing could be more beneficial than such criticism from distant viewpoints.

This missionary goes on to attack next the intemperance which prevails in lands influenced by the Christian religion. Christianity does not forbid or even discourage the use of intoxicating liquors; indeed, it commends it. But Mohammedanism forbids the practice. African tribes converted to Christianity soon are weltering in alcoholic besottedness, while those who instead are under Mohammedanism remain or become abstinent and prosperous.

This apostle to us poor Christian heathen next points to the significant fact that there are no priests as such in Islam. The iman who leads the prayers may be a butcher or baker or tailor. There is no class of priests, and therefore there is no inducement for a man to cling to error. The Christian minister educates himself at great expense. His occupation becomes a means of livelihood, his only means of livelihood, in fact. A Christian minister in St. Louis said to Mr. Webb once: "I do not believe a great many things. But what am I to do? I am fifty-five years old. I can not cast myself adrift. I must go on preaching, for if I quit, I starve."

Among the reasons why Christians should take up Islam are:

"Because it makes every man individually responsible for every act he commits and every thought he thinks, and does not encourage him to sin by teaching him a vicarious atonement. Because it is elevating and refining in its tendencies, and develops the higher, nobler elements of humanity when it is faithfully, wisely, and intelligently followed."

The essentials of Islam Mr. Webb sums up as the unity of God, the inspiration of the Prophet, cleanliness, prayer, fasting, fraternity, alms-giving, and pilgrimage.

The Mohammedan tenet of the unity of God Mr. Webb opposes to the Christian doctrine of the trinity, which he considers as the doctrine of three gods.

The religion of Mohammed secures cleanliness in the following way:

"The Mohammedan must pray five times a day, at sunrise, at noon, between four and five o'clock, just at sunset, and at bedtime. He must pray at each of these times, and in this way he is at least five times during the day reminded of his religion. Each time he prays he must make his ablutions, and thus the virtue of cleanliness goes hand in hand with prayer."

A merit of Islam is laid before us thus:

"The great central idea of Islam is brotherhood. All men stand upon a level. The rich merchant, the nobleman, the beggar are brothers. Mohammed taught and practiced this most earnestly. And I have never known of a Moslem being inhuman or cruel to a brother Moslem."

We commend to the attention of Christians, with their judgments perverted by their one-sided education, the following truth:

"They say that Islam is the religion of the sword. This is a strange reproach for Christianity to bring to Islam. What religion has as bloody a record as Christianity? When Omar and his army entered Jerusalem in the religious war not a drop of blood was shed. When the Crusaders entered it seventy thousand men, women, and children were put to the sword. Even in their bloodiest wars the Mohammedans spared the old men and the women and children."

Our Moslem proselyter well continues:

"Think, in the eighth century Moslem Spain was the home of the arts and sciences, the highest type of civilization in the world, while Christian Europe was plunged in ignorance and in blood and was overrun with monks who thought it a sin to be clean."

An important point is the following, made on the scriptures of the rival faiths:

"Read the Bible, then read the Koran. And if any fair-minded man does not say that the Koran is the better book, I'll eat it."

"The Old Testament is in every Christian household. I have two little girls. With God's help I shall see that they never read it. For it is the most obscene book I know of. It contains things that are utterly filthy. There is not a line in the Koran that anyone could object to, that could not be read anywhere or by anybody."

The morality connected with these two religions is further touched on:

"Islam in its highest form is the broadest, freest, most satisfying formulation of ethical truth known in this world."

"It has been said that if you strip Christianity of its three errors, the immaculate conception, the vicarious atonement, and the trinity, you have Islam. The moral teachings of all systems, of Islam, of Buddhism, of Christianity, are the same. All the great inspired teachers taught the same ethical code."

Here, however, is a certain error, or exaggeration. It is not true that religious founders have taught the same morals. Their ethical systems have been alike only to a certain degree. The rules of conduct to which it is necessary that men conform in order to exist in society, of course are nearly the same in all lands, and in so far as founders of religions took these up the various religions embody similar moral injunctions; but these founders often failed to select the right conceptions on morals from those which they found about them, and often added erring and pernicious notions of their own, and often coupled with their moral teachings supernatural doctrines whose effect was to vitiate and defeat the former. The codes are not the same.

We hope that our Antichristian friend Muhammad Alexander Russell Webb—the "Muhammed" was prefixed to his name on his entering Islam—will have huge luck, not in establishing his religion, but in lacerating, dilapidating, deracinating, and otherwise making away with the doctrines and usages of Christianity.

Government Hand-in-Hand With Religion.

It was arranged that as a part of the ceremonies of the presidential inauguration at Washington the marine band should give a concert on Sunday, the 5th, in the pension building. At this the preachers of that city sent to the Senate a protest against this rival entertainment on the day of which they have been allowed a monopoly. They declared that the rendering of music by a national band in a national building on Sunday would be "a national sin." One feature of the protest we find commented on by a popular daily in these words:

"Those Washington clergymen who are aghast at the sinfulness of permitting the marine band to give a concert next Sunday seem strangely deficient in the sense of humor. For their mouthpiece, chosen to utter their protest against the 'national sin' of music on Sunday, they selected Matthew Stanley Quay, a notorious political corruptionist and a man who a few years ago embezzled nearly half a million dollars from the treasury of this state, and by virtue of the statutes of limitation has escaped the punishment which might have brought repentance for his 'sin.'"

Upon the presentation of the protest, the men who govern our nation at once began scurrying about to purchase the favor of the religionists. The president-elect sent the following telegram:

"LAKEWOOD, N. J., March 1, 1893.

"TO THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR: I am strongly opposed to the use of the pension building for a Sunday concert on the 5th inst., and object to regarding such a thing as a feature of inauguration."

"GROVER CLEVELAND."

Secretary Noble immediately sent the following reply to Mr. Cleveland:

"WASHINGTON, March 1, 1893.

"HON. GROVER CLEVELAND, Lakewood, N. J.: Your telegram received. Orders were issued already forbidding the use of the pension building on Sunday, and I am gratified that this action is in accordance with your wishes."

JOHN W. NOBLE, Secretary."

Before the telegram from Mr. Cleveland had been received Secretary Noble had forwarded the following communication to the chairman of the inaugural committee:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1, 1893."

"COL. JAMES G. BERRETT, Chairman Inaugural Committee, Sir: My attention has been called to the fact that it is the purpose of the inaugural committee to open the pension building on Sunday, the 5th inst., for one or more musical entertainments at which a charge for admission will be made. I have to inform you that, in granting the use of this building for the inauguration ball, it was not contemplated that the building should be open to the public on Sunday, and as there will be opportunity on the subsequent day, during which the building is at the disposal of the committee, to give the concerts referred to, the use of the pension building on Sunday for that purpose will not be permitted. Very respectfully,

"JOHN W. NOBLE, Secretary."

The correspondence upon the subject concluded with the following additional note to Mr. Berrett:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"WASHINGTON, March 1, 1893."

"COL. JAMES G. BERRETT, Chairman Inaugural Committee, Sir: Since my letter to you of this date, relative to the use of the pension-office building for a musical entertainment on Sunday next, I have received a telegram from Mr. Cleveland of which I inclose you a copy, expressing his strong opposition to the use of the building for a Sunday concert, and objecting to such concert as a feature of the inauguration. I also inclose for your information a copy of my reply thereto. Very respectfully,

"JOHN W. NOBLE, Secretary."

This action of the preachers is an impertinent interference with the rights of those who wish to make music or to listen to it. In its influence music is refining and uplifting. There is no more possibility of "sin" in listening to it on Sunday than on any other day; no more harm in enjoying it, as the New York World aptly puts it, than in rejoicing in the sunlight or the songs of Sabbath-ignoring birds.

Shakspere.

Colonel Ingersoll lectures at the Broadway Theater, 41st street and Broadway, this city, next Sunday evening, March 12th, on Shakspere. People who haven't heard this lecture are but slightly acquainted with the immortal William. It is calculated to pain friend Burr somewhat, but that must be forgiven, considering the opportunity such a subject gives such an orator. Tickets should be purchased early to get the better of the speculators.

The World's Fair From a Freethinker's Standpoint.

In May we shall begin the publication of a series of letters which will be of great interest and beauty. Samuel P. Putnam will write them from Chicago, and they will be about the World's great Fair, which opens in that lively and booming town on May 1st. Mr. Putnam's description—as everyone who knows him knows—will not be the commonplace matter of the geniusless boiler-plate correspondent, but the impressions made upon a cosmopolitan poet by the aggregation of samples of the world's progress in mechanics, art, literature, knowledge. The letters will undoubtedly be big and broad, wide and deep—a picture and a panorama, a history of human advance from "that man in the dug-out" to the racial subjugation of the forces of nature—so far as these forces are subdued. The letters will be essentially a Freethinker's view of the Fair, what it shows, and what it foreshadows, and we venture to say that among the hundreds of correspondents at the Fair, and the thousands of letters to be written by them, there will be none like the writer of the Freethought views and his descriptions. Readers of his "News and Notes" will agree with us in this estimate, we know.

We shall be obliged to our friends if they will call the attention of their friends to this announcement and suggest to them that a six months' subscription will insure them the receipt of these letters, which will alone be worth many times the cost of the paper.

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "Paine's Great Works Complete" (3.00). This edition of Paine's works contains a picture of Paine, of the statue proposed to be erected in Chicago, and of his monument in New Rochelle.

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers" ($3.00). By D. M. Bennett.

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to have at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselves of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

Having apparently succeeded in getting Congress to cripple the World's Fair at Chicago by requiring it to be closed on Sunday, the ultra-puritans have now begun a crusade against "the nude in art." They would like to put a basque on the Venus de Milo and drape the nether limbs of the Apollo Belvedere in trousers. They want nothing shown in the art galleries which presents the human form outside of the dreary bags made by the tailor or the dressmaker. In every age the "respectable" have, says Colonel Ingersoll, "been opposed to the works of real genius. If what are known as the best people could have had their way, if the pulpit had been consulted—the provincial moralists—the works of Shakespeare would have been suppressed. Not a line would have reached our time. . . . If the Scotch kirk could have decided, nothing would have been known of Robert Burns. It is not too much to say that every book now held in high esteem would have been destroyed, if those in authority could have had their will." And so, if the present puritanical domineers of our government could have their will, art would be crippled and smothered. Is it really their whole will, what of pleasure or use would be left in the world?

In our next issue we shall print our concluding words to Mr. Anderson, showing what certain great men believed on design in nature. We are pleased, too, that a life of Charles Darwin by his son Francis, just published, will enable us to present to our readers in the same number the views of that illustrious discoverer not only on design but on Christianity, revelation, and various arguments for the existence of a God.

New Editions.

New editions of the following books are in the binder's hands and will be ready by the time this reaches our readers:

Liberty in Literature. A testimonial to Walt Whitman by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. To which we have added the funeral address, by the same appreciative friend of America's most original poet. This is the only form in which the funeral address can be obtained. Price 25 cents, paper; 50 cents in cloth.

Six Lectures on Astronomy. By Prof. Richard A. Proctor, delivered in Chickering Hall. A popular and most interesting summary of the science of astronomy, and particularly interesting to Freethinkers as overthrowing the Mosaic legend. Price in paper, 20 cents.

Why Don't God Kill the Devil? By M. Babcock, of St. Johns, Mich. Including the poem by that title. A racy and direct little work, unanswerable by Christians. On this we have reduced the price to 15 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. This work is a protest against, and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully, a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Paine's Great Works Complete. Comprising all his religious and theological writings, with a Life. Illustrated. Cloth, $3; with THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

The Crimes of Preachers. This book is on the press, and if the pressmen keep their promises will be ready for delivery next week. Orders may be sent and will be filled as soon as the book is in hand. Price, 25 cents.

The Joys and Otherwise of a New Country.

MY DEAR BROTHER: There are some drawbacks about living in a country with a semi-tropical climate like that of Washington. Sometimes the climate forgets what is expected of it and does not appear. The prospectus calls for two months of damp weather on or about January 1st. The rest of the time we are to be supplied with Italian skies. There is a legend that years ago the sound country had a severe winter, and now when a cold snap comes on the old inhabitant remarks that this is mild weather compared with what we had while Washington was a territory. He was believed last year and two years ago, though I think he was prevaricating then, but the present winter has robbed him of his occupation as a liar; for the latest arrival has seen ice in the river, the thermometer 10° below nothing, and three feet of snow on the ground. The old settler stood by the territorial temperature until he had to turn his thermometer. People who came here from the East to escape the severity of your winters expressed some surprise at the way zero climbed over the mercury. A revivalist from Rhode Island joined us at the time cold weather did, and was heard to express some apprehensions about the prudence of frequently alluding to the temperature enjoyed by lost souls during his labors among us.

The only tropical growth in Washington is the boom town. Soon after I reached Snohomish in the middle of 1891, I went down the river eight or ten miles one Sunday to look at a town site that was then attracting some attention and real-estate speculators. It was mostly stumps and swamps. Its inhabitants were dwellers in tents. I met the editor of the paper there, and to give our conversation a literary varnish, told him the place reminded me of New Eden, which showed that I had read Dickens and also that he hadn't. He had on boots that reached to his hips, and I was afraid he would kick me with one or both of them when I explained myself. The town now has five or six thousand inhabitants, who refer to Snohomish as a suburb. I may add that it also has a big shipyard, one of the largest nail factories in the country, the leading paper mill of the West, an electric light system, and a water system, and is the salt-water terminus of the Great Northern Transcontinental railroad. It now proposes to incorporate as the city of Everett with some forty square miles or so within its limits. The people down there are trying to steal our court-house and have assurance enough to ask for the state capitol. Their cheek is in good repair and they do not propose to let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on the damask roses of the same.

My residence in this city is on Nob hill. My lot is 60 x 128 feet, and has but eleven trees and eight stumps on it, besides those covered by the house. The stumps are comparatively small, being not much larger than the platform of a Coney Island merry-go-round. When I get these out and have eradicated old Stinson's skidroad that he logged over in the sixties I shall be ready to plow and put in garden truck. The avenue I live on goes more than a block beyond my house before it gets lost in the woods. Any Snohomish person that you meet at the Fair will tell you that I live in the heart of the city. I shall try gardening this summer, and expect to succeed at it if the mortgage note doesn't drop due on my vegetables and put their light out. We have the mortgage here as in the East and its notes keep people awake nights when everything else is quiet, although this is a new country. The lot I live on is my first attempt at cornering the soil. I have not been a monopolist before, and when I think of the troubles that afflict wealthy grabbers like myself I cannot wonder that so many remain poor. To look at a cedar stump whose roots extend back to the carboniferous era, and contemplate the task of getting them out without first removing my lot, keeps me from enjoying my estate as I thought I should when I consented to own it.

I have spoken of the roads which disappear in the woods. Of course these roads are disappointing to people who would like to travel somewhere over them, but you have no idea what a bank they are for country editors to draw on. We couldn't very well get along without them, because after a while if we had not "The Necessity for Good Roads" to write about we would have no subject at all. The new editor may start off blithely on the resources of the country (we haven't got so far as "products" yet), and tell about our lumber, our concealed mineral wealth, and our vast undeveloped agricultural domain. He of course says that as yet little is known about these, and the general and non-committal style of his remarks proves the statement. The subject will not pan out more than one good article. Twice or three times a year, maybe, there is a fire in town that catches the volunteer firemen out of hearing of the bell and the engine-horses hauling sand. This furnishes an excuse for a powerful article on the apathy of the city council touching protection against fire, but interest in the subject dies out before the hose is dry. The owner of the burnt building gets his insurance and doesn't understand what the editor is roaring about. Politics doesn't last long, religion is not conspicuous enough to need dressing up very often, and so before he knows it the editor has nothing for his blood to boil over. Here is where the virtue of bad roads shows itself. The poor road is like the Mormons. It hasn't a friend in the community, and the editor can yell "Giv Us Better Roads" and not lose a reader of his valuable paper. The county commissioner is elected on his promise to see that the farmers have better roads to haul their produce over, and the representative to Olympia agrees to introduce a bill for a state system. We have a special election occasionally to bond the earth for a road and bridge fund, when everybody goes to the polls and votes against the proposition. Finally the settlers build the road themselves, and then to keep them from shooting outsiders who travel it the county commissioners accept it. Until our county highways are all paved and have patent sidewalks roofed over, our cry for better roads will be repeated. We have a standing sarcasm to the effect that the road to hell is much pleasanter than that from here to Hyas City, because it is paved.

I presume you have heard of our senatorial deadlock, and have inferred that political fences are built very high by our people. It is quite true that sentiment is divided by party lines, but that is not what troubles the legislature. We are overwhelmingly in favor of getting appropriations from Congress to grade our lots, dig our ditches, and water our yards during the dry season. The man to represent us in Washington city is the man who can steal the most out of the United States treasury. It is admitted that any senatorial candidate would steal as much as he could get away with, but the split has come over the question of dividing the wad. For instance, we want the Snohomish river improved so that ocean steamers can discharge cargo and passengers at Ferg's wharf. Residents along Swinomish slough desire that inlet made over into a ship canal so they can get their cranberries into the markets of the orient; while, as I understand it, the bunch-grassers east of the Cascade range have a scheme in view to irrigate the Great American Desert. The Swinomish slough folks are not enthusiastic for irrigation, as they have to wear gum boots the year round now; the bunch grassers, with the Rocky mountains on one side and the Coast range on the other, think a ship canal is impracticable, and neither of them care whether the snags are taken out of the Snohomish river or not. Hence the lack of unity of purpose among representatives from the different sections. If we finally elect a senator who doesn't steal a cent from the rest of the country we shall probably be sorry that we did not return the man who has been drilling at the treasury for the past two years.

Speaking of legislators, do you remember John Brown Smith, who went to jail in Massachusetts a dozen or fifteen years ago rather than submit to taxation without representation? He is now a resident of this state and represents Douglas county at the capitol. I received a letter from him the other day in which he inquired after you. He also referred to his experience as a convict, and observed, "You see I have not reformed, but I am in the legislature instead of the jail."

Science and Progress.

Boodle Resources.

"Take away the fear of hell," says the abbé Laménais, "and the support of the clergy would be gone." But who knows? Even in heaven the abbé's colleagues might sell furlough-tickets to Christians doomed to pass eternity whining psalms in praise of Jesus.

An American Expert.

The Annual of the Swiss Tourist's Guide publishes an article under the title, "How to Combine Pleasure with Profit." The Rev. Dr. Parkhurst might furnish some interesting hints on that problem.

Natural Allies.

The Chinese bonzes consider opium a necessary evil, needed to assist true believers in the final renunciation of worldly vanities, and deserving toleration, as long as the poison-venders do not expose their merchandise in the pagoda bazars (sacred to the sale of holy relics). Our gin-shops, too, have prepared millions of souls for the gospel of anti-naturalism, and the opposition of our clergy to the progress of the liquor traffic would largely cease if they could stop the sale of spirituous stimulants on the day they wish to reserve for the dispensation of spiritual tonics. Some of the Old World priests, in upper Austria, for instance, contrive, indeed, to assist their parishioners in their heavenward progress by brewing beer, or operating large vineyards and wine-presses.

A Sensible Precedent.

In the early days of Mohammedanism the califs, as successors of the Prophet, were, ex officio, the primates of Islam; but the Bagdad commander of the faithful snubbed and bulldozed the provincials till they got tired of his insolence and openly defied his authority by electing pontiffs of their own, like the iman of Muscat and the Persian sheikh-ul-Islam. Suppose our American Catholics should solve the "autonomy problem" in a similar way? What transatlantic cable expenses and worry about suppressed appeals that plan would save!

Imported Pests.

The rabbits which some foolish colonists brought to New Zealand have multiplied till hundreds of fertile farms have had to be abandoned by their owners. They devour the growing crops, ruin orchard-trees, and cause inundation by undermining the irrigation-dikes. The aggregate of mischief thus caused is estimated at $5,000,000 a year, and the Dunedin Herald denounces the importation of the ruinous rodents as "an unparalleled folly, considering the fact that the little pests were not indigenous to the country, and had to be petted and acclimatized at considerable expense." But were our priests and parsons indigenous to the soil of the New World? Were not their importers, too, guilty of a most gratuitous folly, and have they a right to complain that the long-eared pets have multiplied till their aggregate expense to Australia and the two Americas amounts to something like $500,000,000 per year? To some degree, however, we can also share in the consolation of the afflicted New Zealanders that "the wretched parasites can not subsist upon the native products of the soil, and may be starved out by withholding their artificial means of support."

Mount Stromboli.

The continuous earthquakes on the island of Zante appear to extend their influence to the Lipari archipelago, where the volcano of Stromboli has for weeks illuminated the sky with the glare of its fire-storms. One branch of its network of volcanic clefts is in a state of almost perpetual activity, emitting blasts of cinders, with a wheezing noise resembling the puffs of an old engine. Its lava-streams, too, have formed quite a bank of bituminous deposits, and once in four or five years the crater indulges in a first-class eruption, like that of February 7th of the present year, when its whirls of black smoke were plainly seen from Monteleone, on the west coast of Italy, at a distance of sixty-five miles. The Lipari islands are only sparsely inhabited, and our theological moralists would not fail to point out the goodness of Providence in that life-saving arrangement, if the much more ruinous hell-vent of Mount Vesuvius had not been planted in the midst of the most densely populated districts of southern Europe.

An Eye-Opener.

The managers of the Buddhist missions at the beginning of our chronological era, had no hesitation in resorting to bribery, in order to increase the number of their converts, and like our Christian propagandists in the East Indies, had a keen scent for getting on the track of talented individuals in necessitous circumstances, and putting them in a way of bettering their spiritual and secular prospects at the same time. Is it not possible that a light of that sort dawned upon Paul, alias Saul, when he journeyed to Damascus in quest of employment?

Widowed Infants.

In Catholic Spain, twelve years for a girl and sixteen for her innamorato is considered a marriageable age, but the Spanish Americans go still further, and in Peru babies of ten years are now and then betrothed to rich Don Juans, old enough, with such marriage laws, to be their great-grandfathers. The traveler Burmeister, in the chronicle of his sojourn at Porto Santo, mentions a little vixen of eleven years who had been widowed twice, once by the death and once by the desertion of her husband. With the clerical moralists the promotion of a chance for nuptial and baptismal boodle has always outweighed the objections against premature marriages, and in the island of Corsica the evil had to be abated by a junta of strong-minded rustics, confronted with the peril of overpopulation under circumstances that encouraged them to defy the protests of their priests.

A Tearful Privilege.

In this best of all possible worlds the "solace of tears" is not strictly a human prerogative. Antelopes, llamas, and reindeers, in distress, as well as in a state of sexual disappointment, weep like Methodist revival preachers, and the East Indian Rhesus monkey, if provoked to rage, will flush crimson and use the back of his hand to rub the tears out of his eyes. Laughter, on the other hand, is a more specific human function. Animals left at the tender mercy of their Christian fellow-creatures have "nothing to laugh," and the grin of our Darwinian cousins is intended rather as a menace, analogous to the snarl of a dog showing his teeth.

A Banner Bird.

Among the zoological curiosities of southern Australia there is an "owl parrot," half hawk and half cockatoo, and rivaling the plumage of the silver pheasant. In captivity it amuses its owner by its inquisitiveness and its insatiable appetite; it will prow about a darkened room like a cat and make a spring at every bit of organic substance—dead mice, herrings, potatoes, fishballs, and cockroaches. But the sudden opening of a window shutter throws it into a flutter of still more ludicrous excitement. It will shriek out a more and more emphatic protest, and finally take refuge in the darkest corner and refuse to be consoled till night or the closing of the shutter restores the congenial darkness. That light-hating fowl could not be rivalled for a banner-bird of Jesuitism.

Silencing a Watchdog.

Our Mexican neighbors tame savage dogs by chaining them to a log that breaks their energy by its weight and checks attempts at too rapid progress by knocking against the knees of the racer. With a similar ingenuity our Christian countrymen limit the enterprise of a meddling scientist by chaining him to a college professorship and hampering his liberty and liberalism with the implied duty of discretion.

Grace Before Meat.

From Kate Field's Washington.

When Julia carves at household feast—

A figure so benignly sweet—

Across my brain will often flit

The saying of an old-time wit,

"Grace before meat."

When Julia carves with dainty hands,

Whose every touch is light and neat,

The toughest breast should tender grow,

The driest joints new flavor show—

"Grace before meat."

When Julia carves, her gracious smile,

Which gives to me a welcome sweet,

Sends through my heart a curious thrill—

Devotion doth my spirit fill,

"Grace before meat."

A Secret Out.

That scandal was ripe it was clear;

For instead of a dime the deacon had dropped

In a check, reading "Good for one beer."

The Grandeur of the Skies Proclaims: "There Is No God!"

To A. AUGUSTA CHAPMAN, Esteemed Friend:
When we contemplate existence, and with our limited capacity endeavor to grasp the depth of space, the vastness of distances, the colossal proportions and the countless number of cosmic bodies, and the lightning speed with which they whirl on through their interstellar orbits; then place this knowledge, together with the aggregate of science, in the crucible of reason, it seems strange that so intelligent a lady as you can continue to believe, that among or within this whirlpool of revolving, gyrating, flying masses, a living, breathing, sentient being can exist, whom or which you please to call "God," "Soul of the Universe," "Omnipresent Personality," and kindred names.

If a telegraphic message could be sent to the moon from our earth, it would reach its destination in about a second. It would traverse the distance between here and the sun—92,000,000 of miles—in eight minutes; yet there are stars—suns, worlds, and systems—even in reach of our telescopic vision, so remote that it would take a message years to get there; saying nothing of the countless number which exist beyond the range of our strongest lenses. Please permit your thoughts to ponder upon the aspect of boundless space and all it implies and tell me, is it reasonable, comprehensible, that a single living, breathing gigantic being—a personality—can exist on each and all of them and within the interstellar spaces between these gigantic, whirling, moving bodies, and survive?

Astronomy emphatically proclaims to all candid and comprehensive minds: "There is no God!" To those whose power to grasp the actual magnitude and aspect of cosmic existence is inadequate, the result, of course, is the opposite; they are awe-struck, bewildered, and failing to comprehend actual existence, are prone to accept a supernatural solution therefor.

But you, my friend, are now subjecting your faith to the behests of science and reason. Pray, then, tell me of what nature is the God you worship, where is "He," what is his outline, and what are "His" characteristics?

If we gaze through the great "Infidel" telescope on Mount Hood, to the remotest star, we do not discover God. Changing its range but a hairs-breadth we traverse distant space for billions of miles, but, alas! no God. We change again, again, and again, and could continue the search for ages. Still we behold space filled with countless suns and systems in every direction, all flying with inconceivable velocity, never ceasing for ages and ages, yet we have not discovered a trace of your God or any other God.

Where then is the God you worship? What is "He" whom you invest with personality? In all our researches we behold nature, supreme and grand, here and there and everywhere—never a God. In our closest analysis we see nature only, its order and operations, but absolutely not a vestige of any "God," "Deity," or "Supreme Intelligent Power." What then is it you cling to, what basis remains for your faith, having discarded the God of your fathers and a faith in the Bible?

You say "a soulless nature would speedily lapse into a state of inertia." Nothing could be farther from existing facts. All matter is pregnant with life and vitality, physical and chemical forces, ever "struggling"—yes, fortuitously—to evolve into shrub, flower, tree, man, world, or sun. I will give you a pound of gold for every grain of "inert matter" you may bring me, the teachings of your childhood days to the contrary notwithstanding. Would animal life cease to evolve from inorganic matter without your God? Would bodies cease to fall, fluid forms in space cease to assume a globular form, in a soulless universe? Would fire cease to burn, powder not explode, poison not kill, or water run uphill without a God? Would cosmic phenomena come to an end and eternal chaos exist in space? Bosh! If phenomena necessitate a Creator, infinite simultaneous phenomena necessitate an infinite number of Creators! I would rather believe that a single mechanic could make every watch, clock, sewing-machine, locomotive thrown in, in the world in a single day than believe that a single God could create every human being, horse, cow, hen, fish, snake, elephant, shrub, tree, and flower at one and the same time. How does your God make them? You well know all these phenomena are the inevitable results of existing natural causes and not the achievements of caprice or mind. It would, indeed, require the energy of countless millions of Gods to stop the motion, growth, and development of all of nature's products, and then they—couldn't do it!

Have you ever pondered concerning the nature of the Divinity you still believe in, and which or whom you honor with the appellation "He," "His," the "Deus Homo" of your faith, and whom you invest with the personal attributes, such as wisdom, love, omnipotence, etc.? Did you realize that such attributes necessitate physical organic being, and that in all the realms of nature such attributes only exist concomitant with limited, finite organic forms? Can you worship such finite God as the ruler of an infinit universe?

All your definitions of the various Deities you have spoken about sadly lack consistency, but an "Omnipresent Personality" is the easiest exploded. An Omnipresent God would monopolize all space, crowd out you, me, everyone, and all the universe besides. Hence, by parity of reasoning, the presence of you, me, and one billion five hundred million other mortals, this world and all other worlds, absolutely crowds out such "Omnipresent Personality." Is your "O. P." something or nothing? If something "He" must occupy space. But it is the nature of things that two personalities cannot occupy the same space at the same time. (Destructive of the dual or spirit human body also.) You, I, and the universe occupying space, explodes the notion that any other personality can occupy all space.

But a God implies more than Omnipresence. It implies that such a God fills all space, but in addition can be in you or in me, or in the eye of a needle also, at one and the same time. It implies he can be everywhere, in one or in countless millions of places—each a perfect God—at the same time. Not, indeed, in part, but the entire God! It implies that a complete God can be in every human being, in every eye of a needle, and still only one God in the universe. It means this and nothing less. To believe in a "Divine Personality," and believe that only part of "Him" is in the eye of a needle or in you or me, is absurd. Because such a part of a Divinity which fills all space would be so infinitesimally small that the one billion five hundred million human beings of this world wouldn't get as much as a part of "His" big toe to divide among themselves; and as God is "Divine" only by virtue of his completeness such small part of divinity in you and me could not possibly represent the "Divine Presence" you adore. You are compelled therefore to allege that the "O. P." you believe in can divide itself into innumerable little Gods—but each remaining an entire and complete God—and "inhabit" each monad, insect, bird, reptile, man, on this world and on all other worlds, and in addition still be the only solitary "Omnipresent Personality" filling the entire universe; or you must discard every God-idea, as you have the Bible God, as miraculous and absurd. Choose!

But permit me in kindness to further show the absurdity of all God-ideas. To be a God and all it implies absolutely necessitates organic being, and this you concede in your last letter. Now please assist me to grasp your ideas correctly. This organic being, implying form and material to cause such form, anatomy, respiratory and circulating organs, nervous system, brain, etc.—for without these living beings are impossible—you say is "Omnipresent," everywhere. But you are somewhere. Then you and I and 1,500,000,000 other beings—leaving out "varmint"—move around in Him! and the entire universe moves around in Him!!! Or how is it? You say this boundless being reaches from here beyond the last star and system. If so, then all must move around in Him! Am I correct? But now, if we are in God, and the entire universe is in God, and this in perpetual motion, each planet gyrating around itself with lightning speed and besides sweeping through space—or God—at a fearful rate, how can such Divine Organic Being survive such terrible turmoil going on in "His" body or bowels? "Oh, stop! this is ridiculous," I hear you say. Well, my dear friend, I know it, but don't blame me if, in an honest analysis of your idea, it turns out so.

But if we are not in God, "He" must be in the universe. Is this more reasonable? Well, where and how does such a being exist on this, on all other worlds, and in the interstellar spaces between them also? Remember all is a gigantic perpetual mobile. Please imagine yourself boarding a train passing by you at the rate of a thousand miles an hour, and it would not approximate the danger a living being would hazard to "board" this world revolving with incomprehensible velocity even on its onward march with like speed through space. In fact, to accomplish such a feat and survive—even if not incinerated by the moving atmosphere, or frozen into an icicle in space—is a physical impossibility.

But suppose a "Divine Being"—were it thinkable—should attempt to visit the earth, as "He" is said to have done in days of old, what part of "Him" would come in contact with the earth? and it seems to a crude reasoner like myself that the first contact would be a good deal like placing one's nose against a grindstone, making sparks fly, to say the least! Then if successful on the earth, and at the same time on Mars, Jupiter, Sun, Sirius, etc., and all these revolving in diverse directions, how can any personality survive such conditions?

But you say: "God is a spirit, not to be knocked to pieces by a fast-flying world. Your thoughts can traverse interstellar spaces without being frozen out or incinerated." A "spirit." Well, when science and philosophy come to an end and wisecracks desire still further to penetrate the realms of the unknown, they then resort to assumptions like "God" and "spirits," and are content in thus solving existing mysteries, never considering that of all mysteries these are the greatest.

Now, my friend, please guide me through your realms of spirits, both human and Divine. Most Spiritists insist that they are an exact counterpart of man in appearance, attributes, and functions. But what are they composed of? What are their constituents? Where was your spirit or mine a hundred years ago; and if not in existence before the physical body, how can it survive when the latter exists no more? If the body is a necessity to originate and continue the spirit during life, is it not a necessity during eternity?

Is not the human mind, you call "spirit," simply the function of the living physical organism, created or generated from this animal body, its heat, electricity, magnetism, etc.? Are body and mind not cause and effect? Is the effect ever known without the cause? There is no mind or spirit in the air, in electricity, in ether, or in any form of inorganic matter, either on the earth or off in space; and we must first discover an animal, either high or low, before we can reasonably predicate mind or a God. This not being discovered, and life being impossible in interstellar space, in between the moving bodies, all acute and honest investigators must concede that a God or spirits do not exist.

So with human spirits, so-called. This belief, based principally upon intense yearning of frail humanity (which you confess) for life and eternal bliss, has no foundation upon fact, but a cunning priesthood was ever shrewd enough to make lots of capital out of such morbid desires. But there is no such thing as mind or spirit per se, apart from the animal form. The duality of man is a physical impossibility which students of physiology must concede. There is no room within man for such dual body, no more than for a God in nature.

A spirit-body and all it implies, if it exists at all, must resemble man. But the outline of man necessitates anatomy, organs, flesh and muscles, to cause such outline. What causes the outline of such dual man, which you claim survives man during all eternity, when all that which originally constituted man is buried and not a grain left out of the coffin to constitute a spirit or anything else? What is this surviving spirit? Please define this phantasm. It has never been done. What is inside of this spirit which causes it to resemble man? Is there another spirit-body within this spirit-body you believe in? How can it resemble man without physical organism? How can it live without blood and circulating organs, breathe without lungs, see without eyes, and think without a brain and nervous system? Is physiology a farce which teaches that all these are a necessity to produce the various functions of man? How can it—this most delicate organism thinkable—(if indeed it is thinkable!) while still in the "grosser body" survive decapitation, electrocution, or a dynamite explosion? And last but not least, by what law of nature is it exempt from the general order of nature which decrees that all forms which begin, from the tiniest to the grandest sun in the universe, must sooner or later come to an end? Even all cosmic bodies and all they contain will again be resolved into their constituent elements, hence the audacity of frail monads like man clamoring to outlive suns, and worlds, and systems, caps the climax of audacity!

"Traversing in thought" interstellar space is simply a mental feat—one of the memory and imagination—and to insist that every time we think of distant stars or friends in distant lands, our "spirit" actually "escapes" from our physical body and accomplishes such journey, defying all laws of nature and distances, is to insist that miracles are the order of the day.

When speaking of matter "selecting" other matter, we use the term in the sense of chemical affinity or natural selection, a purely chemical process and not one of volition.

I will define and prove the existence of matter, and trust our good friend will be as successful to prove the existence of her God and spirit in her next: Do you exist? If yes, then you are something. This something is matter. If you are something, no matter what—the antithesis of nothing—then you are matter. Is the universe something or nothing? If something it is matter, if nothing we would not be here to debate this question.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Free-thinkers.

We are pleased to announce to our German-American friends that Frau Wilhelmi, the well-known Freethought lecturer, has so far recovered from her recent injury as to be about again.

Our friends in Victoria, Australia, are not afraid to let the world know that they are Freethinkers. At a recent census 5,028 stated they were Freethinkers; 2,658 said they had no religion, while 306 named themselves Atheists.

We call the attention of those of our German friends who are peacefully inclined to the monthly publication Die Waffin Nieder! published by Bertha von Suttner. The publication, which is an excellent one, is the organ of the international peace organization.

It is stated upon good authority that the Italian government contemplates the removal of the remains of Garibaldi, the great Freethinker and national hero, to the Pantheon at Rome. The island Caprera, where he is resting at present, will be used as a naval station and strongly fortified.

The Freethinkers of Anderlecht, Belgium, are on the warpath. They are bound to frustrate the plans of the orthodox to introduce priests in the communal schools. It would be well for this country would Freethinkers join the Freethought Federation of America and do some active political work.

The Spanish government and the Catholic church are evidently doing some hard thinking. The treatment of the recent international Freethought congress at Madrid is arousing indignation everywhere. Public meetings are being held and resolutions condemning the government and the church are the order of the day.

In the German army the reading of Freethought papers is prohibited. Dr. Specht's Menschenheit has caused trouble for a private soldier, who is a regular subscriber of that paper. "If I find it again, you will march to the guardhouse," said the captain on finding the second copy of the iconoclastic paper. How those Christians do love their enemies!

Our esteemed Hungarian contemporary, Onállás (Independence), is very indignant because we some time ago referred to Hungary as a "province." We are fully aware of the fact that Hungary is a state by itself, but as the Austro-Hungarian constitution is about as intelligible to us as the doctrine of the trinity, we preferred to follow the common political rule and refer to Hungary as an Austrian appendage.

In Sweden Freethought is having another boom. Victor Lennstrand and Dr. Wicksell seem to be everywhere. But at the same time we cannot fail to notice that Stockholm seems to be the only seat of the boom. The rest of the country appears dead. When Capt. Otto Thomson, to whom Swedish Freethinkers, and Victor Lennstrand especially, owe so much, was at the helm, Freethought was heard all over the country and not in one or two places.

The organizers of the recent international Freethought congress at Madrid have been put in bonds of one thousand francs each to appear for trial. In the name of the Freethought Federation of America we send our Spanish brethren our best greeting. The Inquisition has not yet died in Spain. But the treatment of Freethinkers, as given of late, will act worse than a boomerang. Freethought is bound to win, for Freethought means progress.

Several prominent German-American Freethinkers have issued a manifesto and call therein upon all German Freethinkers in the United States to join the "Society for Propagation of Radical Principles." The religious part of the new society's constitution calls for an "absolute emancipation from all faiths, all authority, and all ghosts of a spiritual world." Politically, it demands equality, direct democracy. Socially, some kind of Socialism. Among the promoters of the society we may mention Frau Wilhelmi, Hermann Lieber, and Karl Schmemmann.

News and Notes.

I remained at Washington as long as I could see any possible chance of a reversal of the infamous act of Congress. So far as public sentiment is concerned a vast gain has been made, but what has been accomplished among the people has found no voice in Congress. The issue has been avoided, and now other means must be employed if liberty is to triumph. The church has won a costly victory. Liberalism will only be strengthened by the mighty battle which is before it. To surrender at this point would be cowardice indeed.

I had no heart to enjoy the gorgeous display of the inauguration. It means nothing for the advancement of the human race. It covers up a great wrong. In the midst of all this splendor there is rottenness. President Cleveland has shown himself to be the puppet of the church. He has officiously interfered to prevent the concert which was to be given at the pension building on Sunday evening. This is simply an outrage. Why should President Cleveland forbid the innocent amusements of the people? Is that democratic or in accordance with the principles of a secular government? A vast number of people will be in Washington on Sunday, the pension building will hold an audience of twelve thousand, but the pension building is shut against these people on Sunday night, and at the request of President Cleveland. It looks as if Cleveland would be as bigoted and narrow-minded as Harrison himself, and that no gain for justice has been accomplished in his election. He bows down to the church. He tries to enforce a puritanic Sunday. He is a hypocrite, and a hypocrite is generally worse than an honest fanatic. I had some hopes of Cleveland. I thought he was Jeffersonian in his ideas, but he is not. He takes up his quarters at the Arlington at $475 per day. He has all the luxury and entertainment he can desire. He is a rich man and a lucky man, but he is no genuine American or genuine democrat when in the midst of his wealth and honor he shuts the gates of a great building against thousands who have not his opportunity of enjoyment, who are crowded together, who want some recreation, who must stay at home or roam the streets because this fortunate individual prefers to have the pension building dark and silent instead of illuminated and glorious with a magnificent musical festival which would gladden the hearts and ennoble the minds of all those who attended it. Cleveland wields the tyrant's hand in behalf of the church. He begins his administration with an act that should arouse the indignation of every Liberal in this land.

I am in the field once more, and it is a relief to touch the heart of the people—which after all is sound and true—and to deal no longer with those false representatives of the people, who dare not express an honest thought unless they are mighty sure beforehand that it is with the popular side. I have been in an atmosphere of insincerity, of vacillation, of palaver. I have not struck one in Congress who is a thorough and fearless leader. I have found smart men—men of business, men of society—who make a brave show, who can appear well and talk well, who are very kindly as the world goes, and on the average are honorable and upright. I don't find any out and out bad men. Respectability prevails in the halls of Congress. The "good man in politics" seems to be in the majority. He is well dressed and sublimely virtuous before the eyes of his constituents, but I have not found a born leader—a genius for command. I have not found the splendid spirit that would dare all for the sake of justice. I have not found a single original man. The successful politician is tediously commonplace.

I have not lost my faith in the people, but somehow the genius of America finds but little expression beneath the dome of the Capitol.

I leave Washington on Tuesday evening and journey toward the sunny South, where I have never been before. I am booked for Savannah March 1st and 2d. The train is delayed a little beyond China Grove, in North Carolina, for three hours. The engine breaks down and we are obliged to wait for another engine to push us forward. I am thus half an hour behindtime for my Savannah engagement, but the audience patiently waits. I have a most favorable reception in this city, where, I guess, a Freethought lecture has never been given before. The prospects were bright for a full house on Thursday evening. But alas, it rains very easily in this country. It clouded up over the bright blue sky of the morning, and at the hour of the lecture it was pouring like a flood and only a few were present. I did the best I could. A Liberal organization was effected, and it is hoped that something will be done for Freethought in this delightful land where the magnolia trees spread their brilliant blossoms.

Savannah is an old city for this continent. It has an ancient look in its streets and houses. It is, however, a beautiful city. Oglethorpe gave it plenty of "breathing space" when he laid it out. Parks are plentiful and the trees are mighty and venerable. These many parks, or "squares" as they are more commonly called, were described as "breathing spaces" by Oglethorpe, and these antique adornments still abide and give the city a refreshing appearance. There are numerous churches—to the value of about $5,000,000. The Catholics have a stately cathedral. The building in which Wesley preached is still here.

There are a number of institutions of learning, some of which were founded over a hundred years ago, and are the pride of the state. There is direct water communication between Savannah and Liverpool and large quantities of cotton and rice are shipped. There is but little wheat or corn produced in Georgia—not enough for home consumption. Savannah has a population of sixty thousand. It is slowly growing, has but few factories, and depends mainly upon commerce. It has one of the finest harbors on the coast, and the largest vessel can anchor alongside its wharves. It ought to be ten times more populous than it is, with a great country back of it and a vast ocean in front of it, but for some reason—slavery perhaps—the tides of trade flowed in other directions. The country about Savannah is lovely; broad fields and noble forests greet the eye. My friends drove me out to the Hermitage, one of the old-time magnificent residences of Georgia, now abandoned, left to a state of wild luxuriance and splendid decay. It was once a famous plantation, with twelve thousand acres of land, and in the heyday times of the "patriarchal institution" five hundred and fifty head of negroes lived here, not counting the children, or the "undergrowth," as our colored coachman picturesquely described the latter. It must have been a lively village before the war. The McAlpines lived here—of Scotch descent—and for three generations ruled this vast plantation. All is ruins now—the mansion, the hundred little brick huts, the hospital, the gin cotton mills, etc. A melancholy desolation appears. The orchards, the gardens, etc., are draped in somber wastefulness. The trees, centuries old, broad-branching, stand like blasted giants, with gray habiliments of moss, so that the sceneries are like solemn cathedral arches. One arch stretches in dim vista a mile away, the ancient drive from the house to the main road, and as we look along its quivering distances it seems in its pale effulgence to reach to the very land of ghosts. Never were beauty and the aspect of death more strangely mingled than in this old hermitage, where the past is vivid with pictures and the future is like a blank. The very roses and green grass seem the garniture of corruption, yet all is so lovely and so attractive.

I am sure there is a large Liberal element in Savannah. Under more favorable circumstances there would have been crowded houses. I hope that next time nature will be more smiling upon our efforts. It is no use to pray, and we must take our chances with the sunshine and the storm. But Savannah is a place of pleasant memory and of bright anticipations.

Sam Cherry, John A. Windburn, Arnold Becken, and others, are among the stalwart Liberals of Savannah who have borne the brunt of the battle, and who can be depended upon for future work. Mr. Sam Cherry is a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber and is ready on all occasions to vindicate his principles and to show THE TRUTH SEEKER to his orthodox friends without fear or favor. I am indebted to him and to others for kind attentions while in Savannah and for a view of the city and its surroundings, and I hope I shall strike hands again with these brave and generous allies.

The Adventists Winning.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Your readers are more or less familiar with the facts in the persecution of Seventh Day Adventists in this state. For several years members of this sect have been pursued by the authorities, especially in the western portion of the state, and various persons have been fined and imprisoned for doing ordinary farm work on the first day of the week commonly called Sunday. Last summer in this county, four Adventists convicted of maintaining a nuisance (!) by Sunday work, were imprisoned in the county jail here and worked in the chain-gang with vicious negro criminals, imprisoned for theft and kindred offenses.

In harmony with a threat made at that time that he would "prosecute every man, woman, and child of them until they quit it," Attorney-General Lewis secured last September indictments against eleven of the male members of the Adventist church at Springville, in this county, and even made inquiry about what the women did on Sunday in the privacy of their homes. Six of these indictments have just been quashed, one case has been tried and the defendant found not guilty, one case remains yet to be disposed of, and three of the indicted persons have not yet been arrested.

Prior to last summer about $5,000 had been spent in this state fighting the Sunday laws, but apparently nothing was accomplished by it; and in the cases in this county at the May term of court last year practically no defense was made. Each of the Adventists arraigned at that time made a statement to the court to the effect that he was conscientious in working on Sunday, believing that he had a constitutional and a God-given right so to do. But four of the five then on trial were convicted, and upon refusing to pay the fines and costs amounting to about $25 in each case, were committed to jail and subsequently were worked in the streets in the chain-gang with brutal negro criminals.

The facts just stated coming to the knowledge of Prof. Jas. T. Ringgold, a member of the Baltimore bar, and professor of law in the Baltimore University, that gentleman proposed to the National Religious Liberty Association, through whose publications he had learned the foregoing facts, that if permitted to do so he would appear in defense of the persecuted men in the present cases. His kind offer was accepted both by the Association and by the several defendants, and in order to afford him every facility possible, Mr. W. Carter of the Henry county bar was employed to assist him in the defense.

At this stage of proceedings ex-Senator Tolley of this state appeared upon the scene, having been attracted by the notoriety of the cases and by his interest in the principles involved. The ex-Senator at once proposed that his friend ex-Governor Porter, formerly judge of this judicial circuit and subsequently chief magistrate of the state, should also be brought into the cases. Some doubt was expressed as to the willingness of Judge Porter to appear as counsel in behalf of the persecuted men, as he had been entirely out of the law practice for twelve years; he not only consented, however, but like Professor Ringgold, proposed to give his services freely because of his interest in the cases, his respect for the parties interested, and for the sake of the principles involved.

Upon examination the attorneys found that six of the indictments were defective, and these were quashed by the court upon motion. This left only two cases for trial and at this writing only one of these has been disposed of—namely, that of W. D. Dortch, described in the indictment as "Billy Dortch." This case was tried on the 3d inst. and resulted in a verdict of acquittal without the jury leaving their seats.

It was proved in Mr. Dortch's case that he had worked on two separate and distinct Sundays. On one occasion he was seen by two witnesses "doing something in his garden," just what they could not tell; while upon another occasion he was seen by one witness "piling chunks" in a clearing on the back part of his farm. The attorney-general made a desperate attempt to show that it was Mr. Dortch's custom to work on Sunday, even going so far as to subpoena and attempt to put on the witness-stand the defendant's own son, a boy only ten years of age. But this the judge would not permit.

In his plea to the jury the attorney-general made an effort to excite their religious prejudices, but upon objection the judge directed him to confine his remarks to the record. This left him with but little to say, and not in first-class humor to say even that. Nevertheless he continued for several minutes pleading for conviction and insisting that if true to their oaths the jury must bring in a verdict of guilty.

It was evident, however, that the attorney-general was waging a losing fight, and whatever hopes he had of victory for bigotry and intolerance were dashed to the ground by the judge's charge to the jury, which was so exceedingly favorable to the defendant, and at its conclusion the prosecuting attorney abandoned the case by asking the judge to enter a verdict of acquittal, which the court willingly did with the consent of the jury, as willingly given.

But this favorable termination of these cases settles nothing. The decision of the supreme court that habitual Sunday work is indictable as a nuisance still stands, and Attorney-General Lewis declares that he will continue to indict and prosecute these people. For this and other reasons the attorneys in the cases are very anxious to take a test case to the supreme court, feeling confident that they can secure a reversal of the decision given some years since which makes this persecution possible. They have proposed to Mr. Lewis to submit the remaining case upon such a statement of facts as will cover the salient points at issue, but it is doubtful if he will agree to anything in this line. He is feeling too sore over the defeat he has already suffered to again put himself in jeopardy, and as two of his witnesses are absent he can refuse either to submit the case by agreement, or to try it at this term of court, and will probably take that course.

Judge Swiggart has evidently grown tired of having his court used as a religious inquisition to compel people to observe the customs of so-called orthodoxy, and while he will doubtless, in the future as in the past, administer the law as he finds it and as it has been interpreted by the court of last resort, the luckless Adventist on trial before him will be punished, if at all, according to the law, and not according to some of Attorney-General Lewis's perversions of the law. A decided victory for liberty of conscience has been gained in Henry county, and it will doubtless be followed up by a vigorous and aggressive campaign having for its object the further education of the people of this community and of the state along the lines of perfect liberty of thought and action in all matters of religious belief and practice. The Adventists are nothing if not aggressive, and if they fail to follow up the advantage gained they will forfeit much of the sympathy hitherto freely bestowed upon them by all lovers of liberty, whether Freethinkers, Jews, or Christians.

SPECIAL.

Lucy Colman Talks Politics.

I have weeks ago written to the chairman of the Exposition committee at Washington, but most likely the mind of that committee has been made up since the day of its appointment, but it is pleasant to feel that I have done the little requested in behalf of justice though it has apparently come to nothing.

I do not often inflict upon your readers much talk that is directly political, but having had within the past week quite a political confab I think I will write it out as I think some of your readers may not object to reading it. A gentleman from New York city called on me to get some information about myself for a publishing house of which he is agent (how easy it is to be notorious). Among other questions the gentleman asked: "To what political party do you belong?"

"To none. I have no political power whatever; I am a woman and am not represented and so cannot be misrepresented by father, brother, husband, or son."

"But have you not a preference? Would you not have preferred that Mr. Harrison should have been elected rather than Mr. Cleveland?"

"Not at all. No! Indeed, I am very glad that we have a man elected by the party calling itself Democratic."

"Yes, but you were an antislavery woman. Don't you think Mr. Cleveland favors the South?"

"And if he does, what of it?"

"Are you not still antislavery?"

"Certainly, with all my heart, but I am not anti-South. I was entirely opposed to admitting the 'Confederated States' back into the Union. To my judgment the government at Washington should have said, 'You are conquered territory and as such you must remain until you bring forth 'fruits meet for repentance.' Your present generation are embittered beyond cure by the war, which has reduced you to poverty—wait. And to the negro soldier I would have given suffrage, but to the slaves I would have given land, so that they should begin a free life, with the feeling that they were to wait awhile—five or even ten years—by which time they would have learned better than to be trading their votes away to either party."

My friend seemed astonished when I said, "If there is to be favoritism in a family, whether it be a private family in the home or in a family of states, should not the needy ones receive it?"

Now, I know nothing of Mr. Cleveland's favoritism. I have very little hope that I, being a woman, shall be very much better satisfied with the coming administration than with the last; but we shall be rid of Mr. Wanamaker, and, though we may not have what we would like, I trust we shall not have a Sunday-school teacher so ignorant and superstitious that he will shut out of the mails, when printed in newspapers, what he could find in his Bible on very many of its pages.

What a glorious thing it would be for the human family if government would study to be just; if another life could be forgotten in making this one a heaven; if, instead of inducing crime for the sake of punishing it, we would all seek to prevent it, and so give our officers something nobler to do than trying to inflict punishment upon the human family of which they themselves are members.

My little political talk has spread itself too far, but before I close let me congratulate the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that, added to our excellent menu, we may expect a dessert always rich from "the Man with the Badgepin." LUCY N. COLMAN.

An Energetic Epistle.

The difference between Congressman Jerry Simpson—whose letter to Mr. Powell, one of our subscribers, appears among the Letters from Friends—and Congressman Bowers, of California—whose letter to a minister appears below—is that the former had his mind changed for him, and the latter has a mind of his own. The letter was written to a preacher, the Rev. George Glung, Barsdale, Cal. Mr. Bowers says:

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 20th inst. regarding Sunday closing of the World's Fair.

It is not usual for members to reply to such letters, for they come in such numbers—from both sides of the controversy—that it is impossible. But I have disposed of the mail that has come to me in the House this afternoon, and must sit here to vote on the bill now under discussion, and will occupy the time in answering your letter.

It is much like hundreds of others received. You say that you "want your representative on record as opposed to any violation of the explicit command of God."

You are asking a good deal of me, to fill such a bill. Do you do it? Do you know anyone who does?

But who is to say what are "the explicit commands of God?" Who among the contending sects is authorized to pronounce the law for others? The history of the world shows that for centuries the people of one religious sect burnt the people of other sects at the stake in public for the sole reason that they differed in opinion as to what were the "explicit commands of God." The reformer who broke away from "religious bigotry"—as soon as he acquired the power—burnt those who differed from him in religious belief. They tell us the Puritans came to this country to "escape religious persecution," and to "worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences." But they tortured those whose consciences did not dictate in the same line with theirs.

It seems to be taken for granted that the days of religious persecution, when men were thrown into prison and cruelly treated because of their religion, are long past. Would to God they were. We are especially fond of boasting that under the American flag civil and religious liberty is guaranteed to all citizens. The boast is a lie. The evangelical churches of Arkansas and Tennessee have made it a lie. The shameless persecutions, engineered by these churches, of Christians in those states, who only command, was of that right under the Constitution to select one's own day, whatever day it may be, and to work the other days. And Congress is prohibited by the supreme law of the land from interfering between these citizens making laws establishing the religion of one and prohibiting the religion of the other. Yet this is unquestionably what Congress attempted to do in its World's Fair Sunday legislation.

In all the history of the world the blackest pages—the saddest—are those whereon are recorded the cruelties, the horrible murders committed by those who spread and enforce their religion with the sword. Those who in these days seek to enforce their religion upon others by employing the sheriff's posse are just as cruel and infinitely meaner than those who used the sword.

Cannot the evangelical churches see that their very existence depends upon the absolute liberty of the citizen in all matters of religion, upon the utter absence of all religious legislation, of laws regulating and establishing religion? Can they not see the danger they invite by letting down the constitutional bars and demanding that the nation enter upon a system of religious legislation?

Do they not realize that just as surely as they do let down those bars and open the gates, the "mother church" will make the laws, and they will not be in accord with evangelical doctrine?

Are they blind to the signs of the times, deaf to the public, bold avowals of the managers of mother church?

The preservation of civil and religious liberty in this country depends wholly upon the absence of religious legislation.

I believe the best citizen of the United States—the best man in the world—is the real Christian whose religion has taken all the cruelty out of his heart and filled it with love of his fellow-man—that has taken all the devilishness out of his disposition; who, rejoicing in his freedom to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, freely accords to others the freedom he enjoys; who, if he cannot persuade others by reason and argument to believe as he does, never thinks of employing the sword, the sheriff's club, or the prison to compel them. And the worst man—the most dangerous man—is, and always has been, the religious light who would force his religion upon others by the sheriff's club and the prison's discipline, and the more conscientious he is the more dangerous he is.

As for me, I shall keep my oath, as I interpret it by the ordinary meaning of the English words used in the Constitution, and shall strive to keep up the bars, and the gates closed against the religious legislation demanded by mistaken churchmen—and forbidden by the Constitution of the United States. Very truly yours,

W. W. BOWERS.

Liberal Societies.

The meeting-rooms of the Newark Liberal League were unusually well filled last Sunday when T. B. Wakeman lectured on "What the World Owes to Charles Darwin." The lecture was as replete with knowledge as an almost unlimited acquaintance with Darwiniana could make it, while the lecturer was as eloquent as only Mr. Wakeman can be.

The life of Darwin was reviewed and many incidents of his boyhood days were vividly described. The works of the author and their effect upon the scientific world were then spoken of. "The Origin of Species" is one of the best books ever written. It is an epoch-making book. It is one of the greatest works that have ever been bestowed on the human race. What Newton and his 'Principia' did for the inorganic world, Darwin and 'The Origin of Species' did for the organic world."

Mr. Bird also made some interesting remarks. He was in London when "The Origin of Species" was published in 1859 and had a splendid opportunity of hearing the outcries of the press and pulpit against Darwin. The other speakers of the afternoon were Mr. Walker, Dr. Wright, Mr. Ackerman, Mrs. Smith, Mr. Laxe, and Mr. Mayo. Next Sunday Mr. Henry Rowley will lecture.

Professor Adler's lecture last Sunday was on the question, "Is it true that virtue is its own reward, and evil doing its own punishment?" The usual large and attentive audience was present, but it was the opinion of many that the professor did not make his point as clearly as he usually does. He admitted that certain elementary virtues have beneficial results, e. g., the giving of alms is followed by a gladness of the heart. "The higher class of virtues have often no actual reward." To prove this statement the lecturer enumerated many instances where virtue has had as its continual companion a certain amount of pain. Mr. Adler argued, therefore, that since no pleasure followed to compensate for the pain borne for virtue's sake, the virtue was not rewarded. "They who do right because they expect satisfaction are in reality refined pleasure-seekers. They are not moral in the true sense of the word. We should eliminate from the idea of virtue the idea of reward."

The second part of the lecture was then taken up. Professor Adler claimed that evil-doing is not, in the vast majority of cases, its own punishment. He recounted instances where men having become wealthy through questionable practices, went to their graves feeling no pangs of remorse. He quoted an English prison authority to show that out of one hundred and fifty women in prison either for assassination or complicity in a murder, only six were troubled by their consciences. "We see around us every day men who have violated the rules of right with a high hand, and yet hold their heads erect as though they belonged to the elect of the land." The desire to believe that evil-doing is its own punishment comes from the old barbaric desire for revenge—the desire to see a man who has done wrong suffer.

Next Sunday Louis R. Ehrich will lecture on "A Temple—not made with hands." Hereafter the doors will close at 11:20 instead of 11 o'clock.

Dr. T. R. Kinget lectured at the Manhattan Liberal Club Friday evening, March 3d, on the "Relation of the Individual to Society and State." Dr. Gunn, who is presiding officer for the month, was in the chair. The lecture was in the form of a dialog and was in character denunciatory of the present governmental system. In opening his remarks the lecturer declared that the words "representative government" were inconsistent. The government of the United States is "a government of, by, and for the capitalists." According to Dr. Kinget the so-called representatives of the people are in reality their masters. "There is a larger minority who are not represented, and there is no denying the fact that they are slaves. Ninety per cent of all the crimes can be traced to government; were there no government there would be no monopolies." All governments, continued the lecturer, are diametrically opposed to the rights of man. In proving this the Spencerian formula of justice was cited and dwelt upon: "Every man is free to do what he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man." Dr. Kinget's description of the time when governments will be no more resembled in many respects the descriptions we are wont to hear from our Christian brethren of the millennium.

Mr. Hanson in a short speech of ten minutes ably sustained the lecturer. The other speakers were Dr. Gunn, Dr. Foote, Mr. Roberts, Mr. McDonald, and Mr. Oppenheimer.

Two or Three Little Points.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The wrangle between Westbrook and Putnam must seem funny, if not painful, to all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Keep cool, gentlemen. Don't get excited. The best way is to be good-natured in all your discussions, especially in this matter of Sunday opening at the so-called World's Fair, which is a misnomer, as the inhabitants of the largest empire of the world will be barred out. We celebrated the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America in October, 1892, when it should have been done, here in New York, and I will wager will beat anything that will take place in Chicago in 1893.

Clerical Tyranny Is Especially Prominent This Year.

WATERLOO, ONT., Feb. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: We are always full of admiration for your admirable paper. This year, 1893, should afford you a golden opportunity. Clerical aggression and tyranny have so offensively asserted themselves in the United States and Canada that your views should find increased favor in influential quarters. You want to get among the moneyed men so as to develop the sinews in proportion to the brains of your paper. Heston is immense; his blows tell every time. Some of your correspondents, though, if you will allow me to say so, might better reserve their contributions; they mean well but lack judgment; others appear to write for the sake of seeing themselves in print. Your leading articles, notes, and correspondence are always good—up to the mark every time, and will eventually gain you a support of the right sort.

May THE TRUTH SEEKER flourish, is the wish of Yours fraternally, W. S. HODGINS.

Written to John T. Powell, Waterloo, Kan.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 17, 1893.

MR. JOHN T. POWELL, Dear Sir: In reply to yours of recent date, seeking information as to how I voted in the last session of Congress on the Sunday opening of the World's Fair, will say that if you had gone to some newspaper office, and hunted up the Congressional Record, as they nearly all have it, you could have gotten that information for yourself, as my vote is on record, as voting for the closing of the Fair.

I voted that way because there were so many petitions sent in from our country in regard to that, coming directly from religious organizations, it did seem as though that was the general desire of the people, but later, when the real people began to be heard from, I find that a very large majority are opposed to the Sunday closing. Furthermore, it is in evidence and has been proved that the whisky shops, gin-mills, and gambling-houses of Chicago are very much in favor of the Sunday closing, as that will leave the large crowd assembled there no other place to go to but their "hell-holes," therefore, when the measure comes up again, I shall vote for Sunday opening, as I believe that will be for the best interest of those who attend the Fair, and will enable them to have a place to go to on Sunday that will be instructive, as well as amusing, and will be for the best interests, morally and every other way, of the community there assembled.

Now, then, I hope you are satisfied with the information.

Now, in regard to your supporting me in the future, I don't suppose you will, and I have my doubts that you ever did. You are left free to take whatever course you like, but one thing you can be sure of, that I shall pursue what I consider my duty regardless of whether you support me or not.

Freethought Feeble and Cowed in an Environment of Orthodoxy.

ORANGE, N. J., Feb. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: For many years past I have been talking Freethought principles, in the private walks of life here in Orange, which is a hot-bed of orthodoxy; and a few months ago, as such a large number expressed their Freethought views in such emphatic language and signified a readiness to cooperate by way of employing some lecturer to come to Orange and speak, I paid the rent ($5) for the use of Central Hall, Sunday, February 19th, and agreed with Prof. J. E. Remsburg to speak on "False Claims." (Orange is a city of about sixteen thousand inhabitants, only a short ride from New York city.) I induced editors to publish good notices, where more than one hundred thousand readers in the county of Essex would be likely to see and read them prior to Sunday. I also paid for printing and circulating, by mail and from-door-to-door distribution, more than a thousand invitations to come and hear a free lecture, etc. Friend Remsburg appeared at the appointed hour, and gave us one of his excellent lectures on "False Claims." Mr. Henry Bird, president of the Newark Liberal League, also appeared in good time, with an expert pianist and with their Liberal singing books, so that a very small audience heard a capital lecture and some soul-stirring music. I regret to state that only two of my numerous Liberal friends in Orange appeared at the lecture. They dare not let anyone know that they have attended a Freethought lecture. Yet in private conversation they will declare, as I have often heard them: "The Bible is a falsehood from beginning to end; and I can prove it." But orthodoxy is so powerful here in Orange, and Freethought principles are so unpopular, that we can not induce enough to say "we" to take a stand and form a Secular Union. But I have a little paradise in our suburban retreat, for my wife cooperates with me in all my thoughts and plans; and we flatter ourselves that we live in a higher realm of life than the multitudes of Christians around us, who lie to one another, who cheat their neighbors and try to get the best of everyone, and who believe in spooks and superstitions.

Faithfully your Liberal friend,

SERENO E. TODD.

Questions Awaiting Answers.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 22, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Some years ago I listened to Mr. Fritz Schütz's lectures on Liberalism. This forced me to search for truth, and I commenced to read more religious as well as enlightening papers. Soon I found that I was kept in darkness through religion, and now I have the satisfaction to see all my relatives and righteous-thinking friends infidels. Only two-faced and insidious people in my acquaintance still stick to the church. Now that I feel myself free from all religious humbug, instead of giving ten cents to a church I gladly spend twenty-five cents or more for Liberal papers, and work hard with these to open the eyes of the ignorant. I am a poor workingman, but the newsman at the corner finds me every Saturday calling for THE TRUTH SEEKER, also now and then ordering one of the advertised books. I find Mr. Bennett's "Answers to Christian Questions" a good book to work with.

Still another good way to make people think, which helped me along, is by asking the following questions, which I would like to see appear in your valuable paper:

If God wants us to know, love, and fear him, why does he not appear?

Is he good, as the priests say?—what reason do we have to fear him?

Is he omniscient?—why do we molest him with our private matters and prayers?

Is he omnipresent?—why build him churches?

Is he righteous?—why think he will punish those whom he himself created full of weakness?

Are we benevolent through God's grace?—what cause has he to reward us for it?

Is he omnipotent?—why does he allow us to be blasphemous?

But is he incomprehensible?—why do we meddle with him?

Is the knowledge of God necessary?—why does he hover in obscurity?

In last Saturday's TRUTH SEEKER I find our friend E. Livezey complaining about the meanness of all Baltimore papers, but I must say that our Philadelphia is just as black in that matter. The only paper here that does not favor churches is the German Philadelphia Tageblatt.

Yours for Truth, JOHN FOLLERT.

Calls It the "World's Church Fair."

CRAWFORD, MICH., Feb. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: A word as regards the World's Fair. Having talked with quite a number of Liberals in this vicinity, I find that they are unanimous in declaring that they will not attend the World's Church Fair of 1893, made so by Congress and by the Fair commissioners at the instigation of a class of men who have never contributed to any of this world's goods and are nothing but leeches on the world and their parishioners. And furthermore, we want nothing to do with the World's Fair souvenirs, as we look upon them as nothing more or less than badges representing superstition and ignorance, and but little better than stolen from the people without their consent or knowledge by a Yahoo Congress and Senate, or perhaps more appropriately the devil's Congress and Senate. And now, Christian- and robber-like, they want to sell them back to the people from whom they took them for one hundred per cent profit on their ill-gotten gains. In our opinion it would not well become an honest Liberal to either be seen at the Fair or have the Yahoo badge.

Since writing the above I have just read the piece by Robert Swail, of Belvidere, Ill. He seems to be in exact harmony with our feelings here, and if it is the feeling generally and is acted upon the Fair will be as destitute of sight-seers as the churches are of hearers, and their coffers will be as empty as a church contribution-box and they will have but little need to run their machine on any day. Please let us hear through THE TRUTH SEEKER the opinions generally of the Liberals by some of our best writers on the above subject.

I am doing all I can to get subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it being tax-paying time here money is very scarce. But this will soon be over. Quite a number of the Liberals said they would take it as soon as they could get around to it. I am carrying mine as fast as I get them read and distributing them amongst them.

WILLIAM C. DECKER.

The Sunday Despots Do Not Deny Themselves Anything.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I found the following pithy verses at the end of a speech made some thirty years ago in the English House of Commons, by Mr. P. A. Taylor, against a bill for shutting off sundry small trades in London on Sunday. This bill was "knocked higher than a kite." It occurred to me that you might like to print the poem, as it shows how a sensible Englishman looked at the same question that is up about the Chicago Exposition, viz.: Shall the rich religionists shut out the poor from the only privileged day they have?

The author of the verses is Thomas Love Peacock. Mr. Peacock was an English writer in prose and poetry, of much genius, but his books do not delight very many people. Among them the best are two works in the shape of novels, called "Headlong Hall" and "Nightmare Abbey." Mr. Peacock died some ten years ago or more.

The point of the third stanza is clear enough to a Londoner. In that city multitudes of poor folks get their Sunday dinner cooked at the baker's, and it is brought home hot for the table.

F. B. PERKINS.

RICH AND POOR.

The poor man's sins are glaring
In the face of ghostly warning.
He is caught in the fact
Of an overt act
Buying greens on Sunday morning.

The rich man's sins are hidden
In the pomp of wealth and station,
And escape the sight
Of "the children of light,"
Who are wise in their generation.

The rich man has a kitchen
And cooks to dress his dinner;
The poor who would roast
To the baker's must post,
And thus becomes a sinner.

The rich man has a cellar
And a ready butler by him;
The poor must steer
For his pint of beer,
Where the saint can't choose but spy him.

The rich man's painted windows
Hide the concerts of the quality;
The poor can but share
A cracked fiddle in the air,
Which offends all sound morality.

The rich man is invisible
In the crowd of his gay society;
But the poor man's delight
Is a sore in the sight,
And a stench in the nose, of piety.

If We Have Sin, We Must Inherit It from Our Father, God.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 8, 1892.

MR. EDITOR: Christians declare that all mankind is depraved—born in sin and prone to evil. Now, that is a rascally, damnable assertion to make. I have seen libertines when brought to justice plead as an excuse for their wrong-doings that they inherited their animal passions from their parents. Now grant that is a fact, which is not wholly true, then God must have been a very corruptible being or his children would not have inherited so much depravity. I know that children can inherit the diseases of their parents and sometimes their temperaments to some extent. And then again I have seen very bad parents have the best of children, honest and virtuous, and nothing could induce them to do a wrong. The Christian teaches out of evil cometh good; then devils can beget angels and God beget devils. That is the true solution of all mankind being born in sin. I think the Christian a little off on the God question. I do not believe any human being was conceived or born in sin. That is one of the Christian fibs. To say the Christian lied would be vulgar, but I do say it is blasphemy to charge the god of Nature with bringing her children into this beautiful world in sin. It is also wicked for children to commit crimes against their fellow-man and when brought to the bar of justice plead, to save them from punishment, that they inherited their wickedness from their parents. Why not tell the naked truth, and teach that nature is very fickle but not perfect and that accounts for so much wickedness in mankind and cruelty in the brute creation? If nature is fallible, then it follows that there is no perfection in man or nature's creatures. Every man or woman that commits crimes against their neighbors can reform and become good by cultivating moral thoughts and will force to overcome their evil habits. Prayer will accomplish nothing. Nature cannot be coaxed or persuaded to alter her laws. She cannot return our bodies to dust before we die. If she could, it would be unnatural to die. The Catholic priest and Protestant minister preach that they will be cleansed by the blood of Jesus. Catholics declare Mary was the mother of God, Christ was Father, Son, and Ghost. Then all three were put to death, and Mary, the mother, also is a dead gosling—all four, including God. There is no such thing as a dead God and a live Jesus. Then, Christians, what is the use of praying to dead gods, three in one, to save your rotten souls conceived and born in sin? Your gods died, did they? But your devil was a tough cuss and the oldest inhabitant living. He did not die. But you acknowledge that Jesus died but his father lived. If three was one and one was three, how could there be one living now?

In conclusion, Christian theologians, make up your minds to turn over a fresh leaf from nature's storehouse of knowledge and study Nature's laws that never die and you will see your true God in all his beauty and loveliness. And resolve to live by the sweat of your brows an honest life, be virtuous and become true fathers as your parents did and obey Nature's laws, and you will live happy and die happy and have no fear of the future.

Respectfully, W. W. MORRIS.

A Senator Taken to Task.

OCEAN BEACH, Feb. 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In accordance with my promise I have written to Senator Maher relative to his bill "to set aside one day in the week as a day of rest." The following is a true copy of my letter:

PROSPECT MINING CAMP, }
OCEAN BEACH, Feb. 20, 1893. }

HON. THOMAS MAHER, STATE SENATOR, Hon. Sir and Oldtime Friend: In perusing this letter I hope you will accept it in the same spirit that actuates me in writing it, and I earnestly beseech you to give it your most careful consideration, as, in my opinion and knowledge, the matter herein contained will greatly affect your political interests in the future, which you, upon a careful investigation, will honestly admit.

While reading the Examiner of the 16th of the present month I came across a paragraph which stated that you had presented a bill to the Senate the object of which was to set aside one day of the week "as a day of rest," which I presume to be Sunday. Now, dear Senator, if my surmises are correct, to say I am surprised does not express my feelings. Believing you to be a well-read gentleman, both of profane and of religious history, and thus knowing the condition of all governments where church and state were combined, I had thought that you would have been the last person on earth who would advocate such a measure. Surely you would not see our beloved state in the same condition as Ireland, Spain, or Mexico. Yet such would be the inevitable result under church-and-state rule. The word "rest" in your bill is a blind, the definition of which, when fully realized, means "worship." Are you aware that nowhere in the Bible does the word Sunday occur? No, the word found there is the word "Sabbath," the seventh day of the week, and not Sunday, the first day of the week. Who changed the day of worship from Saturday to Sunday? Pope Constantine of the Roman church. So you will see by investigation that the Protestants, with one exception (the Seventh Day Adventists), do not follow the teachings of the Bible, but do follow the decree of the Roman church. . . . Believing you to be a gentleman of progressive ideas, you are certainly aware that the majority of the population of this country are Free-thinkers, who look upon the Bible, and upon all religions, as the product of man, created by man and by man alone. You are also aware that the churches and church property of this country alone would yield in taxes billions of dollars from which they are exempt. Should this be so? Should they not be taxed as well as the home of the poor mechanic? Ah, dear Senator, if you frame a bill to tax the church property of this state you would have the support and the heartfelt thanks of the thousands of Liberals throughout the state. . . . Now, dear Senator, I must inform you that the Liberal element of the United States are consolidating in one grand body, which is known as the Free-thought Federation, the main object of which is to prevent the union of church and state, and to keep unsectarian our public schools. We are pledged to support only candidates who will pledge themselves to these great principles. It is a political organization, but we make these pledges irrespective of party. If you have not heard of it, you may hear of it ere long. In conclusion I will say that I need not remind you of the barbarous cruelty and enslaving ignorance of the past, as recorded in history, in all countries, yes, even in this beloved land, where church was paramount to state, or where there was a union of church and state. No! let them forever be separated! And for my part I would turn every church into a college, every Sunday-school into a day school, and every priest and preacher into a teacher of science. Hoping you will think over this matter and receive my remarks in a feeling of kindness, I am, Ever your old friend,

WM. PATTERSON.

From the Midst of Active Warfare.

SEATTLE, WASH., Jan. 17, 1893.

TO THE TRUTH SEEKER: I have long wished to have chat with you. I have been a reader of you so long I think I can appreciate it, and would like to give an encouraging word from this locality. I am sixty years old; have been a Freethinker for forty years; have never refused to show my colors and never hauled them down, but when or where I meet a sky-pilot or one of his victims, be it in pulpit, shop, or road, if he shows any disposition for an encounter, I unlimber and at him, and although my guns are of small caliber, he soon finds I have ammunition of a superior kind, and I always take that fort. Quite a number of pilots have lost their bearings, and many of their passengers have gone with them off the seas of superstition and are now to be found on the rock of Reason. Many others are lost in the woods, and if Elisha's she-bears do not tear them, will come out all right in time. The small guns are doing their duty in their sphere. Even the well-educated high priest dare not tackle them. Shame to those who claim to preach a good thing and dare not defend it—cowards, dastards, not worthy the respect of an honorable man or woman on the face of the earth!

The woods of Washington are full of Freethought, and, like its namesake, George, are not to be outgeneraled. Progress is Washington's motto. It is not content to run in the ruts of three thousand years ago. In fact, this coast from Mexico to British Columbia is noted for its liberal religious views. There are plenty of God-houses, for the people for the most part are made up of Eastern emigrants who, like the Chinaman, brought the dragon with them. But this is not a good climate for them, for I find them badly in debt, and begging worse than a deadbeat tramp. Such a good thing they say—By giving you lay up treasures in heaven; but I see all of them rather bank on earth, and I do not see as their note passes for less discount than mine. They do not ask one what creed or church he belongs to, but what about the man. If Christianity makes men good, such questions would not be asked, for all good men pay their honest dues, and their integrity is never questioned. The church, like myself, condemns lotteries and gambling, etc., yet the church folks will get up lotteries, fish-ponds, sell little jugs, auction off their wives and daughters for the evening entertainment to men well known to be frequenters of houses of ill fame and gambling dens—for what? The dirty dollar they receive to keep up the house of God. From whom? Look for yourselves and blush that you are akin to such as they. O consistency, thou art a jewel. Truly there is another Christ wanted to clean the temple of its rottenness, that decent and honorable men can with respect to themselves look therein.

Inclosed list of seventeen books I want for missionary work. I will loan them until some Christians destroy them, as they have several times done, and then lie about it for Christ's sake. JOHN DAVIS.

Good Friends Can Come in for Anything.

ELLSWORTH, KAN., Jan. 27, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In the cause of Liberty, after heartily thanking you for continuing to send me the Light (THE TRUTH SEEKER) for a year without receiving your dues on the same, I will now proceed to send you $6.25 for which, if a delinquent may come in as a premium subscriber, you may send me THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," and twenty-five cents' worth of leaflets to open the World's Fair on Sunday. I used the heading for the petition in THE TRUTH SEEKER to keep the Fair open on Sunday. In two days I got five hundred and ninety-one signatures. Carrying a petition of that sort and energetically urging the people to sign it soon shows the viper-like feeling that exists in the breast of the average church-member. Although I have a good many names of members of different churches to the petition that I sent in, there were very many who were very bitter against opening the Fair on Sunday and just as bitter toward the bearer of said petition. The insults I received were many. One Christian crank told me I had better beat home tending to my business than making a public nuisance of myself. I told him he had better go home and stop looking cross-eyed at me because my work did not suit him. He is a gardener, and works a good deal on Sunday, but I was not aware of that fact or I would have referred him to his disregard for the "Sabbath," as they call it. Another man here who seduced his wife's sister, and is a good Methodist brother, said, "What do you want to take away our Sabbath for?" I replied, "Your Sunday will still remain, even if the Exposition is kept open on that day." He said, "I think you are committing a sin in what you are trying to do." I then asked him why he could not let people choose for themselves what they would do. To me it appeared that he would take the responsibility upon himself to close the Fair on Sunday if he could. "Yes," he replied, "I would." "Then," I said, "you would not be as liberal with your brothers as God is with you and the human family." "I would, too." "No," I said, "you would not. God allows all of his children to do as they please, whether good or bad, and never withholds his blessing from the evil more than the good, while you would not leave the gates open Sunday so they could choose the good from the evil, but by sheer force make everyone do what you thought was right no matter what another might think. And that is the true church idea of everyone outside of it—either rule or ruin everyone who does not believe as they do." The brave man who was fighting one of the Lord's battles went his way without even replying to what I had said. He evidently did not wish to cast any more pearls before swine.

I am truly glad to hear from that Man With the Badgepin. His letters are both amusing and instructive, and one who has lived on the Pacific slope can vouch for the truthfulness of his letter. Long may he live and may his Eye never grow dim but shine with the brilliancy of the stars.

I have two clippings from the Kansas City Star in regard to ministers. If I had kept all I have read I believe I could have saved over one hundred. We have a Methodist minister here who was moving out on a farm and he stole some fence posts and other lumber from the lumberyard and was caught at it. He said he would pay for it, and did; he then wanted a receipt, whereupon Mr. J. Pressny wrote the right reverend gentleman a receipt: "Received of Rev. J. B. Orwig $5 for lumber he stole." The reverend demurred, but that was all the receipt he could get. Then one of the posts was stood up in front of a saloon and placarded, "This is the lumber that J. B. Orwig stole."

TURIN, GA., Jan. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Let me call, Attention, lovers of sacred pictures! Crape for one that recently sold for $13,000!

A few days ago a young lady of the so-called orthodox Christian persuasion, who is taking a "fine course" at an art school, exhibited a picture she had just copied from an original "inspired" design and asked me to give my opinion of it. As the company present was so sensitive—being composed of "theo-sheolistic" material—and differed so widely on "immaterial" things—about which they knew nothing—I asked to be excused, for the present at least, from rendering an opinion which would necessarily involve a subject the picture so forcibly illustrated.

"Oh, I can't excuse you," said the fair artist, "I am so anxious to hear your opinion."

"Please excuse me and I will have my opinion published in the best paper in the world and send you a copy."

"Oh, I can't excuse you," insisted the fair artist. "I brought the picture for you to see, knowing your admiration for pictures."

I then asked her if she wanted my opinion of the artistic work or the idealistic.

"Oh, I am not fishing for a compliment for the work I did—certainly not. I want to know what you think of the original design—that is, the 'inspiration' that brought it into existence."

"Inspiration," said I. "Do you mean the idealistic?"

"No, not exactly," said she. "The word 'idealistic' is better suited to fancy sketches; this is not a fancy sketch, but a real 'inspired' picture, and the original sold recently for $13,000."

"Is that so?" said I. "Then I infer the picture was inspired by Mammon."

At this point a pensive smile lit up the pious parlor at the expense of the fair artist.

"The idea of such a lovely picture as this being inspired by the god of money is too ridiculous even for a first-class comedy," she said with an expression of mixed sorrow and sarcasm. "I made a sad mistake in mentioning the price."

But the fair artist was in robust health and it was hog-killing time in the neighborhood and everybody had plenty of backbone, sparerib, sausage, souse, chitterlings, and fatty-bread; so there was no chance for a swoon in this case.

After placing the picture on the mantelpiece, she asked: "What is your idea of inspiration, anyway?"

"Well," said I, "if you must have it anyway, I suppose I had better get to work." So I gave, as near as I could, Colonel Ingersoll's definition, thinking perhaps no one present would detect the "little draw" I was making on the "bank of brains." But to my astonishment I was caught before I got half through and charged with literary piracy. Owing to the extreme restlessness of the company, which consisted of Catholics and Protestants, I was excused on the grounds that it would be a breach of Christian ethics to render an honest opinion of the picture under the circumstances.

The picture in question, which was first conceived—that is, "inspired"—by Jean Millet, is entitled "Angelus," and represents a pair of pious peasants in a potato patch in an attitude of worship while the bell chimes in the tower of an old cathedral in the background, a mile distant perhaps. The old cathedral has the appearance of being in existence long before Martin Luther quit the Catholic church for reasons that would make anybody blush in the nineteenth century, except a Protestant. Notwithstanding all this, "Angelus" is universally admired, not only by Catholics, but Protestants as well. "Angelus" would fail to attract the attention of a Freethinker, except to serve as a text to show how priestcraft has degraded men and women in all ages. All grades of Christians admire this picture for its simplicity and earnestness of devotion.

Now, let the reader imagine an inspired camera, fresh from the design-gallery of museland, loaded with a pair of pious peasants in a potato patch, with an old thin-pronged pitchfork like Neptune and a wheelbarrow like one of Heston's, with bowed heads, near an old cathedral, and you will have the inspired picture that was "kodaked" for the impressive mind of Jean Millet. The attitude and facial expression of these peasants show ignorance, cowardice, and dependence.

One writer says, "Show me a man's oracle and I will tell you that man's character." Another says, "Tell me a man's character and I will name the god he worships." When I saw Heston's picture of Constantine, I said: "Here is a picture representing all the obstacles in the way of progress and civilization." When I see a picture of a man in full armor I think of Constantine. When I see men and women in the attitude of worship it reminds me of the Auto-da-fé. By way of conclusion I will say that the artistic work expended on the picture entitled "Angelus" is faultless, but the "inspiration" is doubtless the result of perspiration. From experience I find that grumbling potatoes is dirty work, and when mixed with worship it is worse.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Child's Gethsemane.

[The author of the poem below is, we are proud to say, one of our girls of the Corner. The sentiment of the poem is deep and strong, showing genius of a high order, which should not be allowed to languish or grow dim.—Ed. C. C.]

My sweet-voiced mother's song was hushed
As you have heard some timid bird
Break off its song half sung—
As if some mesmeric call is heard—
Or else because the chilling breezes stung
Its tender breast
And made it seek a warmer nest.
Her soft, low mother-song was not half done—
Why, it was only just begun.
But God—motherless you say—still holds the key
Of death, of life, and mystery,
And nothing—no, not deity itself—can feel
For others what itself has never felt.
It is a hard, hard hand the gods have dealt.

The solemn pines cast shadows on her grave;
Faint, sweet, old-fashioned pinks dip deep—
Urged deeper by the tears I weep,
And let their rootlets round her fair hair play—
Perhaps some treasured secret sip
From the poor, helpless, death-damp lip.
Sometimes a deep, wild longing just to see her face
And feel the oft-told rest of lying on a mother's breast
Fills me with mad desire to tear the dust,
To mock the pines, uproot the pinks.
I think sometimes to loose the sands with great salt tears,
And tear them with my childish hands,
Dig down deep and wrap me in her golden hair
And let the sad pines still be singing there.

Pardee Butler and the Raft.

A STORY OF THE EARLY DAYS IN KANSAS.

One of the most interesting episodes in the early history of Kansas, and one that occasions renewed interest whenever related, is the story of Pardee Butler's voyage down the turbulent Missouri in 1855. Mr. Butler was a prominent figure in the early struggles of the territory, and his name will ever stand out on the pages of Kansas history with those of John Brown, Jim Lane, Charles Robinson, and others. Mr. Butler emigrated to Kansas from Illinois in the spring of 1855, settling on the banks of Stranger creek in Atchison county. In August he concluded to go back to Illinois and get his wife and children. He went to Atchison, where he was to stay over night and take the steamboat in the morning for St. Louis. A public meeting was held in Atchison that night to consider Mr. Butler's case, but he was not aware of the proceedings. He was sitting at a table in the boarding-house writing letters when he was suddenly startled by some one calling his name from the outside. He arose to go downstairs to find out what was wanted when he was unexpectedly met by six men armed with bowie knives and revolvers. The first thing they did was to present Mr. Butler with some resolutions, at the same time speaking in the vilest terms of Free-State men and demanding that he should sign the resolutions. Mr. Butler, who was always a man of undaunted courage and in whose heart burned a yearning love for freedom, emphatically declared that he would not sign the resolutions. The angry mob then seized him and dragged him to the bank of the Missouri river, where they threatened to drown him; but after a moment's hesitation the following dialog ensued:

"Did the Immigrant Aid Society send you here?" asked the leader of the mob.

"No," replied Mr. Butler with firm voice and resolute countenance. "I have no connection with the Immigrant Aid Society."

"Well, what did you come for?" again queried the mob.

"I came because I had a mind to come," Mr. Butler emphatically answered. "What did you come for?"

They made no reply, but asked Mr. Butler if he came to make Kansas a free state.

"No, not primarily," answered Mr. Butler, "but I shall vote to make Kansas a free state."

A whole volume of such questions were hurled at him on every side, and Mr. Butler answered them in a decidedly cool manner. All the issues of the day were discussed at length. Finally, Mr. Butler, becoming disgusted with the talk, said to them: "Gentlemen, there is no use in keeping up this debate any longer. If I live anywhere, I shall live in Kansas. Now, do your duty as you understand it, and I will do mine as I understand it. I ask no favors of you."

One of the crowd then said, "My friends, we must not hang this man. He is not an Abolitionist, he is what we call a Free-soiler. The Abolitionists steal our niggers, but the Free soilers do not do this. Therefore, I propose that we make a raft, and send him down the river as an example."

The crowd finally agreed to do this. They secured two logs which they fastened together, and after tar-and-feathering Mr. Butler, and painting the letter "R" on his forehead, which stood for "Rogue," they ordered him to get on the rude raft. The men then took a skiff and towed the raft to the middle of the river where the current was swift, and started him off on his perilous journey down the "Big Muddy." As he floated away he called out to the men: "Gentlemen, if I am drowned I forgive you; but I have this to say to you: If you are not ashamed of your part in this transaction, I am not ashamed of mine. Good-bye."

On looking around Mr. Butler observed that they had placed a flag on the raft. As he started to take down the flag the men called to him and threatened to follow down the river and shoot him if he touched the flag. But with his usual fearlessness he cut the flag from the staff and put it in his pocket. The men did not follow him, however. On this flag was the picture of a white man on horseback galloping away with a negro behind him. Just above the picture were the words, "Eastern Aid Express," and from the man's mouth was flowing the expression: "Greeley to the rescue, I have a nigger." On the horse's neck were printed the words, "From Atchison," and underneath the picture, "Rev. Mr. Butler, agent for the underground railroad."

Mr. Butler took the staff, which was a small sapling, and used it for an oar. He managed to land about five miles below Atchison, near the town of Sumner. From there he walked down to Port Williams, another village further down the river, where he remained over Sunday with Mr. Hartman and Dr. Oliphant. The next day he resumed his journey to St. Louis on the steamboat. From there he went over into Illinois, where he joined his family, and after a brief sojourn he returned with them to Kansas.

Correspondence.

NORTH BENTON, O., Feb. 25, 1893.

MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Children's Corner, and I hope it will not be the last. I am fourteen years old.

I like to read the Children's Corner very much. My grandfather Bedell has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it has been published in New York. I have no brothers and sisters, and I often think myself very lonely. I go to school and study reading, grammar, spelling, geography, physiology, and arithmetic.

I will close for this time.

A friend of the Freethinkers,
GERTRUDE BEDELL.

PERRYSVILLE, PA., Feb. 20, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner. This is my first letter, but I hope it is not the last one. My uncle gets THE TRUTH SEEKER but I see it every week. I am ten years old, and I go to school. My sister and I are the only Freethinkers in our school. My teacher reads the Bible every day. Well, I guess I will close for this time.

From your friend,
NANNIE P. BEVERIDGE.

[Nannie and her sister are two brave girls. May they live long to do good!—Ed. C. C.]

CORVALLIS, ORE., Feb. 15, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would try and write to the Corner. I don't see any correspondence from this place.

The picture of the missionary departing from China is a very fine picture.

I think that the Chinese ought to rout all the gospel-stuffers out of China.

The Chinese would not do as badly as the founder of the Christian religion, the great Constantine—have their wives bathed in boiling water.

I think my letter is long enough for the first time, so I will close.

I remain your Liberal friend,

H. C. NOEL.

[A good letter for the first. Let it not be the last.—Ed. C. C.]

PORT ANGELES, WASH., Feb. 3, 1893.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: Mr. Charlesworth was here lecturing January 22d and 23d. He lectured in the Opera House and had a good house both nights. He gave Christians the privilege of speaking after he was through, but if there were any there they did not say anything. God, Abraham, David, Solomon, and the rest, got a dose from which, in the mind of any sane man, they can never recover. He is in my judgment a very able speaker.

By what I have read of the debate with Clark Braden I think Braden has hooked the wrong fish. Mr. Charlesworth was getting all the applause and Rev. Mr. Braden said he did not want any applause as those that applauded had their brains in their heels instead of their heads. Mr. Charlesworth said this was an insult to the audience, and was rewarded with applause. I hope he gives Braden such a send-off he will not show up again.

I think there are a great many Free-thinkers in this town. At the school to which I go the children are mostly Free-thinkers, and what Christians there are know enough to keep still, and when we are talking they do not say a word.

As this is my first letter I will close, with best wishes to the Corner.

Yours truly, CHARLES A. WOOD, JR.

[Write again.—Ed. C. C.]

ASPEN, COL., Feb. 10, 1893.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I am a reader of the Corner. I like to read the Corner better than anything else I read, except the letters I receive from home. I am a native of Texas, where my father and mother now reside. I live here with my aunt Jennie and uncle Amos Akers, so that I can go to school.

Where I lived in Texas I could not always go to school.

There are three large public school buildings and a Catholic school in Aspen, with full attendance.

I attend the Lincoln school. I am eleven years old and am in the fourth grade. The snow is from three to five feet deep and it is still snowing.

Uncle Amos takes several Freethought papers and we never miss a Freethought lecture held in this place. Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel gave us two lectures about Christmas, and everyone said her lectures were splendid and wished she could stay longer.

The Aspen Liberal Union held a Paine celebration this year, in which I took a part. I spoke a piece from Aunt Elmina with which all seemed to be pleased.

I often wish that you and Mrs. Slenker, or somebody else, would write short pieces suitable for a girl to speak on such occasions or at school.

If my letter appears in the Corner, the paper will be sent to my friends in Texas.

With best wishes to yourself and the Corner, I am, Respectfully,

JENNIE MCBRIDE.

[We shall always be glad to hear from Jennie.—Ed. C. C.]

LISTOWEL, ONT., CAN., Feb. 11, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write another letter to the Children's Corner, as it is so long since I wrote that you will have forgotten me altogether.

My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I can remember. And I think it is well named.

There are not many Freethinkers around here. Sometimes a few of them meet at a Liberal house and have a talk about the nonsense found in the Bible, and about other things.

We live on a farm of one hundred and fifty acres, about three miles south of Listowel. The most of the people around here keep a number of cows and send their milk to a cheese-factory. There is not much bush around here, and most of the farms are pretty well cleared. The principal trees found in the bush are maple, oak, elm, some pine, ash, hemlock, and a little cedar.

The principal fruit trees are apples, plums, cherries, and pears. The small fruits found around here are strawberries, raspberries, gooseberries, currants, and tomatoes.

I will now tell you about a little Liberal friend who lives not far from here.

There was a lady who called for her and her sister on Sundays to take them to church. One Sunday the minister was talking about the Freethinkers, and she jumped up in her seat and would have said "My pa is just as good as you!" had not the lady whom she was with pulled her down in her seat. But the little girl would never go to church any more.

I would like to correspond with some of the readers of the Children's Corner. Hoping that this letter may escape the wastebasket, I am

Your Liberal friend,

HESTER JICKLING.

[There! we call the above a good, nicely composed letter. Hester will always find a welcome in this Corner. We would like to take that bright little girl in our arms and kiss her—the one who wanted to say "My papa is just as good as you!"—Ed. C. C.]

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., Feb. 11, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Mamma has just received your letter, and it has reminded me of a duty I must perform—that is, to write a letter to you.

Of course mamma has written to you and has told you all about our trip to Europe, but I thought I would like to write a little too.

We remained eleven weeks away and spent one month in London.

Papa took sister and me out every day, and we visited many places of interest: the Crystal Palace, where they had a dog show, and poultry—there were over sixteen hundred dogs; Covent Garden, where they sell so many vegetables and flowers; "Big Ben," the clock on the House of Parliament, whose minute-hand is seventeen feet long and hour hand twelve feet.

I was always pleased when papa took us through the "Arcade." Such pretty toys I saw—dolls, drums, soldiers, swords, guns, wooden horses, and pretty china cups and saucers.

We went to the British Museum, where we saw such wonderful things—mummies which were discovered in Egypt; mounted crocodiles and other animals; beautiful statues from Rome and Greece, and handsome vases from all parts of the world.

Papa took us through St. James's park and we saw the soldiers pass through on their way to Marlborough square.

We visited the zoological gardens and saw the monkeys; also the bear who climbs the pole. They were being fed. And we saw the seal kiss the keeper. He was being fed on small fish.

When you were in London did you see the "blue coat" boys? They are bare-headed and wear long blue coats and yellow stockings. It is a charity school. The school is in Newgate street, I think.

Papa and mamma went to the lord mayor's show, but they were afraid to take us because the crowd was so great. All the busses and cabs had to be stopped during the parade, so the people had all the streets to themselves.

I am afraid I am making my letter too long, and I have not told you a quarter of what I saw, but mamma says you are very busy, and I would not like to take too much of your time.

Mamma and Geraldine send their kindest love to you and your sister, and papa, his kindest regards.

I am glad you like the Freethinkers mamma sent you.

With much love, dear Miss Wixon, and to your sister, believe me,

Your young Liberal friend,

PORTIA BROADBENT.

P.S.—Was little Susie that you wrote "The Story Hour" in memory of, your sister's child? She is awfully sweet-looking. And next time when I write will you mind if I call you "Aunt Susan?"

[Yes, little Susie was my sister's only child. She was very dear to us all. I would be pleased to have you call me aunt if you wish to.—S. H. W.]

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

News of the Week.

It is proposed that Monsignor Satolli open the Fair.

JOS. VAN BEARCON, of Bergen county, N. J., has been arrested on counts one of which is that he stood in the public highway and swore profanely thirty minutes.

WM. COY, hanged at Pittsfield, Mass., on the 3d, announced on the scaffold that he had "given his heart to God." His crime was killing a man, of whom he was jealous, with an ax while his victim slept.

THE three men who lead the new sect of "the Holy Ones" at Raleigh, N. C., have induced several weak women to desert their families, and sell their property and give the proceeds to these religious leaders.

A BILL of unusual character has been introduced in the New Jersey legislature. It provides that the utmost sum bequeathable to one's heirs shall be $1,000,000, all that one may leave over that going to the state.

MISS RACHEL CALLAHAN, of Sweetwater, Tenn., will soon conclude a forty days' fast, unless she expires previously. Her brother has whipped her severely to make her eat, but without success. Her motif is religious zeal.

PAUL MONTZ, of New York city, driven crazy by Bible study while trying to determine whether he should remain a Catholic or become an Episcopalian, created a scene in the church of St. Vincent de Paul last Sunday, and has been sent to the asylum.

AMONG the criticisms against the proposed annexation of Hawaii are the charge that it is a contrivance of jingoism to buy popularity, and the allegation that it is an intrigue of the sugar trust of C. S. Spreckels and associates. The project has failed for the present.

THE local directory of the Fair incline to the opinion that prayer will not be necessary to its opening. Some members, however, are swayed by precedent, saying that such a thing as omitting prayer or invocation from the inauguration of a great exposition has never been heard of.

THE Methodist conference has appointed a committee to visit President Cleveland, Cardinal Gibbons, and Archbishop Satolli, and urge them to procure the release of Rev. Mr. Nelson, a Methodist missionary imprisoned in Brazil for remarks on a Catholic patron saint which were offensive to the authorities.

IN Columbus, O., the scene of the late riot against an anti-Catholic lecturer, a human ear was found nailed to a telegraph pole one morning recently. It was placarded as from "the first anti-Catholic victim." It is believed to be the prank of some medical student, but the police are investigating.

THE demand for restriction of immigration, formerly based on the beliefs that labor needed protection, and that the foreigners are more largely criminal than our native, has received the additional motif of excluding cholera. It has been suggested that admittance be denied immigrants possessing less than a certain sum of money—perhaps $100 or $200.

M. TAINÉ, the eminent French philosopher and critic, died on the 5th. His "History of English Literature," though the work of an alien, is the best exposition of its subject extant. This great work in 1863 was entered in competition for the prize of the French Academy, but on motion of Bishop Dupanloup rejected on account of its Materialistic and Atheistic tone.

As the enactment of Home Rule for Ireland seems more likely just now than ever before, the Protestants in the province of Ulster are preparing for forcible resistance to Catholic tyranny. It is being arranged that all the Orangemen shall simultaneously withdraw their deposits from the post-office savings-banks and purchase arms. Prayers against the Home Rule bill are being offered in the Protestant churches.

DAVID and John Deem, who claim to be inspired from on high, have founded a new religious sect in Columbus, Kan. It combines the old faith-cure doctrine with a literal interpretation of the scriptures. It is gathering in converts from all the surrounding country. According to the Deems, the present are the dark days which precede the millennium. These dark days will last for only a few years, and then the millennium will be ushered in. As a result of the Deems' teachings husbands and wives have separated, children have been deserted by their parents, and four men have already been sent to the insane asylum. David Deems, the teacher, works not. He reads the Bible literally and says the Lord will provide. The fact is that his disciples provide for him.

In my judgment it is a stronger piece of fiction than Edward Bellamy's 'Looking Backward,' which at times it reminds one of. It is a merciless exposure of Pharisaism and hypocrisy, which is so prevalent in fashionable Christianity of to-day. It is a good book, and while it will offend many, should be read by all."—[The Arena.]

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 333 pages. This is, beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly calendered, and richly tinted the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published works, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fiske, Eliza Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," "Love, Liberty, Art and Morality," "Science, Nature, The Imagination, Decoration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny," "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual Liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

DID JESUS RISE FROM THE DEAD?

The evidence for the resurrection is in this book carefully considered, and found wanting. It ought to convince every Christian of the untruthfulness of this alleged miracle, for it is certainly one of the best essays ever written on the subject. In paper, 25 cents.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attorneys at Continuity even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

For all of these works address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

It ought to meet with a very large sale.—C. P. Farrell.

The Evolution of the Devil. By Henry Frank, the independent preacher of New York city. The most learned, accurate, scientific, and philosophical analysis of his satanic majesty ever published. The book contains 66 pages, is beautifully bound, with likeness of author on title-page. Price, 25 cents; five copies for $1.

Ingersoll's Address before the New York Unitarian Club. The first time in the history of the world that a Christian association ever invited a noted infidel to lecture before them. Gems of Thought.

To aim at the liberty of a fellow-creature appears to me a crime against humanity; it is the sin against nature.—Voltaire.

DARWIN notes another cause of the variation of species, which he calls Sexual Selection. The male animals battle for the possession of the females. The strongest wins, and transmits his peculiarities to his descendants. In many cases the female selects the male possessing the most perfect form, the most pleasing voice, or the most attractive colors, and these advantages are perpetuated in their offspring. An improvement in the song and beauty of male birds arises from this selection. In savage races the females select the strongest men, best qualified to be defenders; but in civilized races the choice is more influenced by intellectual and moral qualities, and in each case the race shows an increasing variation in the direction of these selections.—Robt. C. Adams.

If ever Christian views could become general and practical, so that life and thought should be ruled by them, then man would cease to strive after earthly improvement and perfection and would subside into a passive faith, turning up his eyes like a dying duck in a thunderstorm. "For," as Ludwig Feuerbach tersely and cogently remarks, "if we are born for heaven, we are lost for earth." When man has once got used to regard himself as a poor, miserable sinner, who can only escape eternal damnation by unceasing genuflections and undignified self-abasement, it is obvious that there is an end not only of human dignity and human pride, but also of human energy and vigor. If we allow supernatural wisdom and power to lord it over us and to provide for us, then an existence worthy of the true end of humanity becomes an impossibility. "The malicious devil," says Luther, "the enemy of God and Christ, endeavors to allure us to think and care for ourselves, so that we may presume to usurp God's office, which is to care for us and be our God."—Büchner.

VOLTAIRE's favorite scheme was still the history of the reign of Louis XIV., which he meant to write on a system unattempted yet in prose or verse; that of dwelling upon things of real and lasting importance, and passing as lightly as possible over wars, quarrels, controversies, and conquests. Here he is the faithful servant of truth. To Thieriot, as to many others, he writes thus on the plan and spirit of this long-projected work: "When I asked you for anecdotes upon the age of Louis XIV., it was less upon the king himself than the arts that flourished in his reign. I should prefer details relating to Racine and Boileau, to Quinault, Sully, Molière, Lebrun, Bossuet, Poussin, Descartes, and others, than to the battle of Steinkerke. Nothing but a name remains of those who commanded battalions and fleets; nothing results to the human race from a hundred battles gained; but the great men of whom I have spoken prepared pure and durable delights for generations unborn. A canal that connects two seas, a picture by Poussin, a beautiful tragedy, a discovered truth, are things a thousand times more precious than all the annals of the court, than all the narratives of war. You know that with me great men rank first; heroes last."—Parton.

The doctrine of evolution teaches that the changes which take place in the universe both of mind and matter follow an orderly sequence, and that each preceding stage potentially contains the succeeding one—that every succeeding change can only be explained and understood through a comprehension of a preceding one. It incites us, therefore, to a study of cause and effect, and encourages us to believe in the possibility of a rational interpretation of Nature. Strictly speaking, evolution is nothing more than a generalization of the idea of cause. Every man within certain limits is an evolutionist, and we have little hesitation in saying that the limits within which each man is an evolutionist are the real limits of his intelligence. When he ceases to be an evolutionist he resigns all attempts to comprehend, and merely records his acceptance of unexplained facts. In the sphere of human history the principle of evolution seems to be fully recognized. The historian who would fold his hands and turn up his eyes before any given event, and say that it was utterly incomprehensible, having no relation, save the abstract one of time, to previous subsequent events, would be scorned by every intelligent reader. We look to the historian to attack such problems with a view to bringing them under the operation of some law of historical development; in other words, we believe fully in evolution as applied to the social and political history of mankind.—Professor Youmans,

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.
By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.
Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

What Some Great Men Hav Thought on the Existence of a God.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER bearing date of the 26th of last November, we conjectured that the propensity of Mr. B. R. Anderson to see a designer in the workings of life and mind, arose from an insufficient acquaintance with the degree to which those workings hav recently been discovered to depend on natural law, in place of supernatural determination. We said:

Life and mind hav originated from the operation of the simple elementary forces of the universe. "We recommend you to look up the late progress made in bringing them under natural law, and you will find a call for a designer no longer. Darwin, Spencer, Haeckel, Bain, Mil, and Büchner will meet the purpose."

In our columns of January 7th our friend replied:

"My embarrassment is to understand how a still closer acquaintance with these philosophers would at all aid me in rising to the Atheistic plane when these men themselves never (with all their wisdom and knowledge) arose to this plane. I do not think you can find any positiv evidence that any one of them is an Atheist."

By a very pardonable oversight, Mr. Anderson has here confounded the two distinct things of finding a call for a designer no longer, and Atheism.

One may recognize the fallaciousness of the argument from design, and still believe in a God, grounding his belief on other considerations, such as revelation, intuition, or various metaphysical notions. Or, still again, he may discredit design and all these other evidences for a God, and yet think that while there is no evidence that there is one there is no conclusiv evidence that there is not, and so remain what is called an Agnostic, pronouncing neither for nor against. Thus it was not necessary that these men should be Atheists. It was required only that they should not find a call for a designer. This requirement is fulfilled; these men do not find a call for a designer; not one of them entertains the argument from design; thus our statement was proper.

Our reason for supposing that Mr. Anderson would after reading these authors become a discrediter of design was, that out of every hundred of intellectual men who read them ninety-nine become such, hence the chances were ninety-nine to one that this gentleman would; thus our inference was proper.

While it is thus seen that it is not necessary that the men named should be Atheists or Agnostics, the fact nevertheless is, very pleasingly, that each of them is an Atheist or an Agnostic. None of them affirms the existence of a God.

Büchner (Force and Matter) pronounces the idea of God "nonsense." He goes on to say that "the Pantheistic or universal God is not one hairsbreadth better than the personal God of the Theist." For his Atheistic declarations Büchner was removed from his professorship at Tübingen, and has since practiced medicin in his nativ town of Darmstadt.

Haeckel denies a personal God with equal flatness. He ridicules the idea of one unmercifully, and declares the notion of an immortal soul equally incompatible with the doctrin of evolution.

Bain's anti-orthodox utterances were such that on his accession to the chair of logic in the University of Aberdeen, the religious folk throughout the country were greatly enraged, and many of the students made disorders that were with difficulty quelled. The whole tendency of his works is against all forms of supernaturalism, or Theism. Referring to Evolution he says: "Properly speaking there is no rival hypothesis. The Special-Creation view is a phrase that merely expresses our ignorance" (Logic). His expressions of disbelief in Theism often take the form of a contemptuous ignoring of it in cases where failure to notice is equivalent to denial. In the following passage we find him oblivious of the possibility of life-forms being adapted by any cause except evolution: "The propositions or laws of Structure, affirm coexistence, as order in place, between the different parts of living bodies. Human Anatomy is a vast congeries of such propositions. How far the coexistences are ultimately dependent on Causation, rests with the theory of Evolution. In the mean time, they are to be regarded mainly as Coexistence without Causation" (Ib.). In like manner he again remarks: "There are numerous and striking coexistences between Structure and External circumstances, the so-called Adaptations of one to the other; but in these there is a great presumption of cause and effect; they furnish the best support to the doctrin of Evolution." Any more direct denial of the existence of a God than these, we hav not met in his chief works. He feared, as do so many college instructors, the anger of the pious, and cloaked his radical printed utterances in those ways familiar to the knowing. We do not doubt, however, that there hav been preserved from his conversations with his friends some thoroughgoing Atheistic utterances; and perhaps one of our English readers will send us some. At present, our friend Mr. Anderson may if he likes except Bain from the number above affirmed to be either Atheists or Agnostics.

Spencer devotes some pages in each of his books to assailing the idea of a personal God. "In one case after another," he writes in his "Biology," "is abandoned that interpretation which ascribes phenomena to a will analogous to the human will, working by methods analogous to human methods." The Unknowable which he affirms has nothing to do with a God. As to the hand of a deity being concerned in the development of life, he says: "All organic beings hav gradually arisen through the action of natural causes" (Biology).

John Stuart Mill expresses his views on the subject in "Three Essays on Religion." He finds valueless the arguments for the existence of a God from the general consent of mankind, from consciousness, and from revelation. The only evidence for one that he can discover is that of design, and this he esteems but slight. And, what is particularly to be marked, he grants legitimacy to this evidence of design only in case that Evolution be not allowed. If Evolution be once established, he thinks, the evidence of design, previously slight, vanishes altogether. Now, he wrote these views many years ago, when Evolution was not out of its cradle; so of course if he were living now when that doctrin has expanded to imperial and unassailable proportions, he would discard design utterly and be a thorough Agnostic. His language will prove interesting. After going over the usual formula of the design advocates he says: "I regret to say, however, that the latter half of the argument," viz., that an intelligent designer is inferrible, "is not so inexpugnable as the former half," viz., that there is adaptedness. "Creative forethought is not absolutely the only link by which the origin of the wonderful mechanism of the eye may be connected with the fact of sight. There is another connecting link on which attention has been greatly fixed by recent speculations, and the reality of which cannot be called in question, though its adequacy to account for such truly admirable combinations as some of those in Nature, is still and will probably long remain problematical. This is the principle of the survival of the fittest. This principle does not pretend to account for the commencement of sensation or of animal or vegetable life. But assuming the existence of some one or more very low forms of organic life, in which there are no complex adaptations nor any marked appearances of contrivance, and supposing, as experience warrants us in doing, that many small variations from those simple types would be thrown out in all directions, which would be transmissible by inheritance, and of which some would be advantageous to the creature in its struggle for existence and the others disadvantageous, the forms which are advantageous would always tend to survive and those which are disadvantageous to perish. And thus there would be a constant though slow general improvement of the type as it branched out into many different varieties, adapting it to different media and modes of existence, until it might possibly, in countless ages, attain to the most advanced examples which now exist. It must be acknowledged that there is something very startling and prima facie improbable in this hypothetical history of Nature. It would require us, for example, to suppose that the primeval animal of whatever nature it may hav been, could not see, and had at most such slight preparation for seeing as might be constituted by some chemical action of light upon its cellular structure. One of the accidental variations which are liable to take place in all organic beings would at some time or other produce a variety that could see, in some imperfect manner, and this peculiarity being transmitted by inheritance, while other variations continued to take place in other directions, a number of races would be produced who, by the power of even imperfect sight, would hav a great advantage over all other creatures which could not see and would in time extirpate them from all places, except, perhaps, a few very peculiar situations underground. Fresh variations supervening would give rise to races with better and better seeing powers until we might at last reach as extraordinary a combination of structures and functions as are seen in the eye of man and of the more important animals. Of this theory when pushed to this extreme point, all that can now be said is that it is not so absurd as it looks, and that the analogies which hav been discovered in experience, favorable to its possibility, far exceed what anyone could have supposed beforehand. Whether it will ever be possible to say more than this, is at present uncertain." Fortunately, it has become possible "to say more than this." Mr. Mill continues, "Leaving this remarkable speculation to whatever fate the progress of discovery may have in store for it," the "present state of our knowledge" affords us "no more than a probability in favor of creation by intelligence." Our evidence is "altogether insufficient for proof." So, he concludes, "the whole domain of the supernatural is thus removed from the region of Belief into that of simple Hope."

As to the views of Darwin the great and good, our correspondent will find an interesting presentation of them on another page of this paper.

This concludes our answer to the points thus far presented by our Theistic friend. We presume that we have frequently misinterpreted his expressions, and stated, as perhaps his, Theistic positions which he does not hold. However, some do hold them, and so our warfare upon those positions will be of use in certain directions. And misconception of his tenets was unavoidable from the modest briefness of his expression. We, and, we doubt not, our readers, will be pleased to hear from him at greater length—not for the purpose of controverting him, but that we may examine his ideas in our search of truth. We will venture to insinuate that in the matter of equality of exchange he is hardly treating us fairly. It is but just that whoever sends forth a certain amount of ideas shall receive back an equal quantity. Then, too, if Mr. Anderson will but drop the idea of a personal God, and discard that harmful term "God" itself—if he will, as in his latest letter he seems disposed to, content himself merely with the notion that all matter possesses intelligence, we shall moderate our language toward him not a little. Both the inventor Edison and the scientist Haeckel we find lately expressing the belief that all matter is living and conscious. We, it is true, do not believe this, but we esteem investigation in such directions rational and legitimate, quite different from the meaningless endeavors of supernaturalism.

That it may not be said that we have left any means untried to convert inquirers on Design to the doctrine of the true church, we will conclude with a story. One day some mice said to one another, "How charming is this world! What an empire is ours! This palace so superb was built for us; for all eternity God made for us these doors and galleries. Do you see those fat hams under yonder ceiling? They were created there for us by Nature's hands; those mountains of meat, eternal aliment, will be ours to the end of time. Yes, we are, great God, if our sages tell us the truth, the end, the aim, the masterpiece, of all thy works. Cats are dangerous and prompt to devour, but it is to instruct and correct us."

Catholics Grasping at New Jersey's Schools.

On the 6th thirty of the Roman Catholic priests of New Jersey assembled at the capital of that state and had presented in the legislature a bill allotting state school funds to religious schools, at the rate of $10 a pupil. They were headed by Rev. Father Connelly, of Perth Amboy, and Rev. Father Sheppard, of Passaic. The true nature of the bill was cloaked under innocent wordings, and professions that the schools would not teach sectarianism. "We Catholics," said Father Corrigan, "are willing to go a long way toward meeting the state on this educational question. We want the state to cooperate with us in carrying out the Liberal views of Pope Leo XIII., as expressed through Monsignor Satolli, the apostolic delegate. In fact it may be said that we go nine-tenths of the way to meet the state." Their first effort was to induce a member identified with the Protestant church, or at least one not identified with the Catholic church, to present the bill. Unable to accomplish this, they finally placed the bill in the hands of Mr. Coyle, of Hudson, and he sent it to the clerk's desk. Opponents declared it unconstitutional, and it was sent to the state attorney-general for an opinion on its constitutionality. This official reported:

"The constitution of the state provides that 'No donation of land or appropriation of money shall be made by the state or any municipal corporation to or for the use of any society, association, or corporation whatever.' I am of the opinion that the act attempts to appropriate money to the use of a corporation within the prohibition of the constitution."

The ecclesiastics accordingly withdrew the measure. They had not, indeed, been sanguine of passing it at once, but wished to feel their way to presenting a bill in such manner as to get it through at some future time. They desired to awaken the sentiment of their following, and will memorialize the legislature from time to time, and conduct popular agitations, in the direction of this end. Father Corrigan, of Hoboken, said last Sunday to his congregation of two thousand five hundred people that the matter was not ended, but from this time the priests would educate their people so they would be in a position to demand justice. He severely scored United States Senator Smith, who had assailed the bill. Father Corrigan explained the bill's provisions and denied it was unconstitutional, as had been alleged. Anybody could receive the same privilege if they complied with the law, he said. Religious exercises would not be used in any way in the contemplated schools during regular school hours. Catholicism would be taught in the afternoon after school hours. He continued:

"Every school board conducting a school nowadays is a corporation. The vital objection to our bill was not on constitutional grounds, but simply because we were not Protestants."

"Rutgers College, a private corporation, asked for $5,000. They were not answered, 'Not constitutional.' The legislature said, 'Constitutional or not, we will give them the money,' and gave it. The college then asked for $25,000 more. Mind you, this is a private corporation allowed $5,000, and were it not for the excitement our bill created it would have got $25,000 more."

"We could have had the bill passed if we were Protestants, but we are Catholics."

"But let me say again, this bill is not a Catholic measure. Any denomination may avail itself of it."

Demands like this one in New Jersey are continually heard in every state. At any moment some state may, in an exigency of politics, give itself over to these requirements. And one precedent would tend to occasion many imitators. Grave evils threaten. Would that Freethought were being more actively diffused.

A Plain-speaker Released.

Moses Harman, of Topeka, Kan., has been released from his second term of imprisonment. Both his first and his second term—we will say to our new readers, and to such of our old ones as may have forgotten—were imposed on him for printing denunciations of certain sexual abuses in plain terms, calling a spade a spade. His motives were pure and good. Opinions differ on the advisability of his method. The animus of his prosecutors was hatred of his infidelity, and a general hostility to radical speech.

Three years ago next month Mr. Harman was sentenced by Judge Foster, of the United States district court for Kansas, to five years' imprisonment in the state prison, and to pay a fine of $300. This sentence was based upon one only of the four counts upon which he had been found guilty by the trial jury, the remaining three being held in reserve.

Lawyer Overmyer procured a writ of error from the circuit court (Judge Caldwell) and in proceedings in error before him, the judgment rendered by Foster was reversed, upon the ground that the judgment omitted to provide for imprisonment "at hard labor."

While proceedings in error were pending, in this case, Mr. Harman was convicted by Judge Phillips in the O'Neill letter case, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment on each of three counts, being one year in all. From this judgment a writ of error was sued out before Circuit Judge Caldwell. He affirmed the judgment, and Mr. Harman was sentenced to the state prison in accordance with the judgment. It was to avoid this judgment that the writ of habeas corpus was applied for, upon which proceeding the prisoner was released on the 19th ult.

The effect of this release is to end totally and discharge the judgment in the O'Neill case. He has yet to meet the case in the district court in which the five years' sentence was set aside—that cause having been reversed with instructions to the district court to "proceed according to law." As the reversal was upon the ground that the judgment, in its very terms, was unlawful, and as the court has once tried the case and once pronounced judgment, the question arises, what further step can the court take "according to law?" Overmyer is of opinion that the court has exhausted its jurisdiction in the case, and that the accused must be discharged.

The long delay in getting Mr. Harman released upon habeas corpus was because of the inaccessibility of the proper court.

The ground of this release was purely technical. The court in no way touched the actual issues of principle involved. The judge found that the imprisonment was "without authority of law," basing that judgment on the one given in a certain Baldwin case, in which there were imposed several terms of imprisonment for several counts, but as the order in which the term for any particular count was to be served was not specified, a pardon for any certain count could not clearly be applied because while one side would claim that the term for that count was one that had perhaps been served the other side would claim that it was for one yet remaining to be served.

We shall print next week Mr. Harman's version in detail of the matter, received too late for this issue.

Last Chances of Having the Fair Open.

An effort is being made to induce the national commission of the World's Fair to open the gates on Sunday, on the ground that the recent action of Congress in voting $570,000 for premiums and awards, and directing that the amount be returned to the national treasurer, absolves the Fair from the provision closing the gates on the first day of the week. The national commission meets at Chicago next month and this question will be brought up.

It is claimed that Congress has violated its contract with the Exposition management in regard to keeping the Fair open on Sundays, and many lawyers say that if the Fair should open on that day Congress can do nothing. The consent of the national commissioners must be obtained, however, and it is doubtful if this can be got.

Then, again, an attempt will be made to get the United States Supreme Court to issue an injunction against closing the Fair gates on Sundays. The suit will have to be brought in the name of the state, and Attorney-General Moloney has given his consent. The grounds of complaint will be that the Fair is an Illinois corporation and that therefore Congress has no power to make the restriction.

A Milwaukee workingman asks that he may work Sundays in order that he may be able to attend the World's Fair on Mondays. The Indianapolis News in reporting this adds: "A commentary on this from the Sunday-closing advocates would be read with great curiosity."

Some Handsome Premiums.

To induce new subscriptions and prompt renewals on the part of our friends we make the following handsome premium offers:

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "Paine's Great Works Complete" (3.00). This edition of Paine's works contains a picture of Paine, of the statue proposed to be erected in Chicago, and of his monument in New Rochelle.

For $5.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3.00) and "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers" ($3.00). By D. M. Bennett.

For $4.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth ($2.50).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards ($2).

For $4 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and a copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in cloth covers ($1.50).

For $3.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" in board covers ($1).

This is a splendid opportunity to obtain books which every Liberal desires to have at an exceedingly low price. Old and new subscribers can avail themselves of it, and we shall be glad if our present readers will call the attention of their friends to the values offered.

The World's Fair From a Freethinker's Standpoint.

In May we shall begin the publication of a series of letters which will be of great interest and beauty. Samuel P. Putnam will write them from Chicago, and they will be about the World's great Fair, which opens in that lively and booming town on May 1st. Mr. Putnam's description—as everyone who knows him knows—will not be the commonplace matter of the geniusless boiler-plate correspondent, but the impressions made upon a cosmopolitan poet by the aggregation of samples of the world's progress in mechanics, art, literature, knowledge. The letters will undoubtedly be big and broad, wide and deep—a picture and a panorama, a history of human advance from "that man in the dug-out" to the racial subjugation of the forces of nature—so far as these forces are subdued. The letters will be essentially a Freethinker's view of the Fair, what it shows, and what it foreshadows, and we venture to say that among the hundreds of correspondents at the Fair, and the thousands of letters to be written by them, there will be none like the writer of the Freethought views and his descriptions. Readers of his "News and Notes" will agree with us in this estimate, we know.

We shall be obliged to our friends if they will call the attention of their friends to this announcement and suggest to them that a six months' subscription will insure them the receipt of these letters, which will alone be worth many times the cost of the paper.

In the Sunny South.

News and Notes.

While it was snowing and raining and pouring down upon the devoted head of President Cleveland and a hundred thousand people were shivering in the gloomy air, I was in the sunny land of Florida, with brilliant skies above me, and flowers blooming upon every side and green grass adorning the sparkling area.

On Saturday, March 4th, I am in Jacksonville, the metropolis of Florida, which presents a busy and charming scene to the looker-on. The majestic St. John's river, five miles in width, stretches away, covered with the paraphernalia of commerce. The streets, the beautiful gardens, with ranks of mossy oaks on either side, the magnolia, the orange trees, the elegant hotels, give an attractive variety.

Jacksonville has a population of twenty-five thousand. It has forty churches, I am sorry to say, and these are offset by ten fine school buildings. There are iron and brass foundries, electric light works, ice factories, and many other industries in which over a million dollars are invested. There are two lines of ocean steamers, six of river steamers, besides railroads to the number of twenty, which make the city quite a center of trade and travel for this great semi-tropical country. Artesian wells flow nearly five million gallons of water every twenty-four hours.

There is a sturdy and progressive Liberal element here, which is an index of the real civilization of the state. At the last session of the legislature an act was passed making Agnostics and Atheists competent witnesses. This places Florida far ahead of Massachusetts in the line of reform, for to-day in Massachusetts an Atheist is not a competent witness.

Wandering along Bay street after my arrival my eye falls upon the attractive establishment of James Douglass. The name is familiar to me; for besides its Scotch and heroic significance, it is also in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I step in, and the first thing to greet my vision is THE TRUTH SEEKER fair and prominent with Heston's pictures in the midst of an alluring display of magazines, newspapers, and books representing the literature of the whole world. I introduce myself to Mr. Douglass, and find a warm welcome at once. I find also that I have been among the missing—that a delegation in the early morning was at the station to receive me, but having no other way of recognizing me except the picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER they failed to discover the original. It didn't take long to make up for lost time, and I am soon acquainted with Captain Rhoads, Captain Garner, J. W. White, Captain Hardee, and others who are on the watch for the Secular Pilgrim, who having traveled from Maine to California, has at last found his fortunate way to the Italy of the New World. As California with its golden splendor is the new Greece, so here on this peninsula will spread a new Italy with the same soft skies and magnificent expanse.

I give two lectures at Jacksonville in the Knights of Honor hall. I have fair audiences, Sunday afternoon and evening. Of course Freethought is still in its struggling days. The Jacksonville Liberal League was organized about two years ago. Only a few have the courage to stand for its principles, but these few are of the kind that will never surrender.

Capt. J. F. Rhoads, the librarian, has established a somewhat new method of advancing the popular mind—the "Free Reform Library." He has a large number of books on all questions of reform—social, industrial, etc.—which he loans to anyone who desires to read them. The only condition is that the books shall be returned in good condition. The captain tells me that most of the books are returned—and in this way one book reaches a large number of readers, and many are induced to read reform literature who otherwise would not. Up to the present time Captain Rhoads has borne the expense of this work, but others are now joining him, and it looks as if it might be a permanent institution, and will break the way for radical Freethought. Captain Rhoads is a thorough Infidel and is not ashamed of the title. A large picture of Ingersoll hangs in his office, and copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER confront the orthodox visitor. It strikes me that this "Free Reform Library" is just the thing. It is an entering wedge, and the result must be not merely reform but uncompromising Infidelity. The captain is an enthusiast and has boundless faith in human nature and progress.

I am quite interested and delighted with the work in Jacksonville and its outlook. It has an element of originality and pertinacity which promises large results some day. I hope this center of influence will remain and permeate the state with progressive ideas. It was through this little body of Liberals here that the act in regard to Agnostic and Atheist witnesses was passed, and other reforms of a like nature are in contemplation. I am inclined to think that Florida will be one of the foremost Liberal states in the Union.

Capt. C. E. Garner is an old New York acquaintance of nearly fifteen years ago in the New York Liberal Club. He has been in this country about fourteen years, and is one of the leading and influential citizens of this section, and every inch of him is a Freethinker, and the preachers know it, and ride upon his boats just the same, and pay their fare. They rather like him in spite of his heterodox views.

On Monday afternoon I journey on his boat to his home at Green Cove Springs, and for once I am ahead of the clergy for I am presented with a pass upon "the Independent line of steamers." After all the pioneer does get into the "swim" occasionally and doesn't have to foot it. The voyage from Jacksonville to Green Cove Springs is simply magnificent. The river is five miles wide and its broad and level bosom in the afternoon and evening sun and glittering starlight and moonlight, with its wooded shores, the orange groves just glinting amidst the ranks of live-oak, draped with gray effulgence of moss, is indeed a poetic and dream-like panorama. I am simply enchanted as I sit in the pilot-house and watch the changing scenes.

The beautiful home of Captain Garner is just now adorned with a tiny little baby, two weeks old, a little bit of a thing, tranquil as a summer's sky, and born to all the glories of Freethought. It is a fortunate stranger and will no doubt remain for many a year in this happy land. It is proposed to call him Ingersoll Darwin. Wouldn't that be a royal name? I am also introduced to Miss May Garner, eight years old, in whose honor a new boat is named, to flash over the limpid St. John. Although she goes to the Sunday-school, I guess she will never join the church, for the atmosphere of superstition will never darken her bright eyes. I have the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Mrs. Garner and Judge Greer, her father, and my visit is made most enjoyable. Judge Greer, having been in this country quite a number of years, gives me a good deal of information about its resources. It is suited to general farming, stock-raising, etc. Oats and rye, corn, tobacco, sweet potatoes, water-melons, cabbage, peaches, plums, pine-apples, are mainly produced, although at present its great staple is the orange, and more attention is paid to this than any other product. Judge Greer tells of going into the country and coming across a somewhat original specimen of the Florida frontiersman. He owned three hundred and twenty acres of land and didn't want any more settlers to come in. In passing through Jacksonville on his way to his homestead, he bought a couple of oranges for his wife. She saved the seeds and planted them, and several noble orange trees were the result. At the time of Judge Greer's visit they were loaded with fruit. One was about thirty-seven feet in height and about two feet through. The judge inquired how many oranges there were on the tree. The man answered, "Five thousand." Being a hardshell Baptist, of course he told the truth; but I must confess it seemed to me all a joke to say that one tree could produce in one season five thousand oranges. But I am assured that it is actually so. It is stated on good authority that one tree in the state produced fifteen thousand oranges in one season. This would make one hundred boxes, which at the usual price would give from $100 to $150 profit. Captain Hardee took the pains to count the oranges on one hundred trees in his brother's grove, and the average was three thousand oranges per tree. Of course these are exceptional cases, but it shows what the orange trees of Florida are capable of doing when of sufficient growth and with favorable circumstances. Some of the orange trees of Florida are one hundred years old and are still bearing.

Green Cove is celebrated for its warm sulphur springs. The curative powers of these waters are remarkable. Three thousand gallons of water, pure as crystal, gush forth every minute. A beautiful picture is presented as one looks into the depths of these springs, twenty feet deep and twenty feet wide. It looks like a huge bubbling diamond, and in the sunshine resplendent colors flash to and fro, as the clear fountain leaps from its cavernous source. I am tempted to remain here, for these waters have a most invigorating effect. In fact I think that Green Cove, with its splendid sunshine; its crystal springs; its beautiful forests; its handsome parks; its shady walks; the vast river, sweeping in one direction eight miles away and in another twelve miles, so that twenty miles of its limpid splendor gleams upon the eye at once—I think that this is about as near to a glimpse of paradise as I expect to get in my Pilgrim's journey.

On Tuesday morning I leave Green Cove Springs and in the afternoon I arrive at Titusville, and here the Indian river opens upon my view. Captain Hardee meets me. He has arranged for lectures at Titusville, at Rockledge, Sebastian, Eden, etc. I expect to have a good time this coming week, and to roam over, by water and by land, one of the loveliest portions of this earth. Captain Hardee plunged into this country twenty-seven years ago, when it was a wilderness and he had to go sixty-five miles to the post-office and to buy flour and clothing, and has helped to make Indian river the garden of the world, where the steamer plows the sunny waters and the locomotive sends its music abroad; where superb hotels are gay with fashion and wealth. I don't think I can write any more this week. My space is already filled up and I have much more to record. I lectured last night to a good audience at the court house. I lecture to-night at the Opera House and expect a largely increased attendance. On my return from Indian river I lecture at Green Cove Springs, at Jacksonville again probably, and finish my Florida trip at Ocala Sunday, March 19th, and then I take a sudden and long plunge into the snows of Maine and the ice palaces of Canada. I hope the blizzards will be over by that time and that spring's ethereal mildness will temper the Northern clime; but for the next two weeks I will revel amidst the orange groves and the magnolias and shall be able to give THE TRUTH SEEKER readers some more pictures of Freethought travel in this entrancing country, where sea and land blend in such marvelous beauty beneath the softest skies. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Titusville, Fla., March 8, 1893.

Science and Progress.

Backing a Crippled Horse.

A dying faith cure crank in Chattanooga, Tenn., answered all the appeals of his friends by flourishing a copy of the New Testament, and finally advised them to mind their own business, adding that he was "perfectly willing to take the risk of erring with the Bible." Consistency is a jewel, even in a sickroom, but it must be owned that the risk involved in the present case amounted to what turfmen call a "fling-away stake."

Fruits of Experience.

There is a story of a shrew who took a trip to a popular summer resort, and on the day of her arrival called her husband's attention to the tameness of the birds in the hotel park: "Just look at that; why, they are coming right up to my feet; they don't seem to be the least bit afraid." "They don't know you yet," remarked the husband. For similar reasons the Cariboo Indians of British Columbia treated the first missionaries with the most confiding hospitality, inviting them to their wigwams and leaving them in charge of their wives and youngsters when they went to the river for a mess of fish. They know better now and instruct their squaws to make a rush for tall timber as soon as their scouts report the approach of a Christian.

Hell Stock Declining.

The Austrian engineer, Werner, has patented an invention that bids fair to abolish the martyrdom of steamboat stokers. His plan consists in pulverizing a lot of bituminous coal and feeding it to the furnace through a pear-shaped "distributor" that can be regulated by means of a lever, and saves the fireman the necessity of opening the hatches of the furnace door. The very prototypes of hell are disappearing before the progress of science.

A Champion of Common Sense.

The Chicago Sabbath Association is preparing a circular to the "representative Christian divines of the United States," inviting their views on the Sunday opening of the Columbian Fair, and proposes to publish their replies in a final "Appeal to the Nation." As a counter-manifesto our American Freethinkers ought to publish a pamphlet reprint of an article that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 4th, under the signature of Mr. Robert Swail, of Belvidere, Ill. Brother Swail limits his letter to a column and a half, but within that little space manages to condense more logic, wit, force, and manful common sense than the C. S. A. folks are apt to get from a ream and a half of "Appeal" sermons.

The Bible Oath.

Italy, at her present rate of advance, has a good chance to outstrip England and the United States in the progress of Rationalism. Signor L. E. Fiorelli, of Venice, has succeeded in getting several hundred signatures to a petition for abolishing the civil disabilities of Freethinkers and the necessity of clinching judicial evidence with a Bible oath. The duke of Otranto (Fouché) proposed a similar amendment ninety years ago, and it is a disgrace to the spirit of the nineteenth century that in many Protestant countries the testimony of an upright and intelligent witness is still apt to be invalidated by the failure to add a formula from the mythology of an ignorant, shiftless, priest-ridden and despot-ridden little back-seat nation of western Asia.

A Historical Oversight.

Billy Bombastes assures his conservativ subjects that he "will always enforce respect to the doctrines of a religion without whose sanction sovereigns cannot rely on the loyalty of their advisers in the council chamber, nor on the devotion of their soldiers on the battlefield." Can Billy have forgotten the history of the Seven Years' war, and the devotion of its heroes to the most heretical king of the eighteenth century?

Correcting Fortune.

It must be admitted, however, that Frederick the Great was, in many respects, an exceptional heretic, since the church, as Voltaire remarks, has "generally had the good fortune to see her adversaries die early." Julian the Apostate and the emperor Frederick Barbarossa perished in their prime, and the great Napoleon succumbed to a holy alliance of the knout and the cross. Kaiser Billy's Freethinking father carried the seeds of death in his breast, and in doubtful cases means were found for "correcting fortune," to use a term of the French gambling clubs. Henry IV. was "removed" by the timely inspiration of an orthodox assassin, and Gambetta and Paul Bert, the champions of secular education, died under circumstances suggesting the conjecture that the education of their pious opponents had acquainted them with the preparation of certain drugs, including "Rough on Rationalists."

Nickel-in-the-Slot Angels.

That there is nothing new under the sun is proved by the anticipation of the nickel-traps by the Scandinavian clergy of the fourteenth century. At many cross-roads of the lonely highlands, as well as near the fords of rapid rivers, they used to erect shrines with an iron box and a small aperture for the insertion of fractional currency. In answer to a moderate deposit an angel was supposed to emerge invisibly from the apparatus and escort true believers across the perilous ford. Those shrines were sometimes located at a considerable distance from the next human habitation, but such was the simplicity of the times that the deposits were rarely troubled, though the church derived a goodly share of its toll from freebooters and smugglers.

Profits of Piety.

A recent biographer of Heinrich Heine contrasts the fate of the reckless heretic with that of his cautious brother; the baron of Heine Geldern. They had been educated in the tenets of reformed Judaism, and both abjured the faith of their fathers, but Henry used his certificate of baptism merely as a passport and soon avowed his heresies, while his brother continued the masquerade to the end and died worth 21,000,000 marks, or about $4,500,000. After renouncing the errors of the Talmud, the pious baron went to Vienna, where he started a newspaper called the Fremder-Blatt (a sort of Pall Mall Gazette), and printed with the spittle licked from the shoes of princes and priests. With that and the side-trade of a lobbyist the slick convert soon amassed an ample fortune, and in order to mask his neglect of his celebrated relative once or twice invited him to assume the editorship of his gazette at a liberal salary, but under conditions which made the great Freethinker reject his offer with scorn. As the happiness of the orthodox heaven is said to be enhanced by glimpses of the doom prepared for the enemies of Christ, the baron's bliss was probably intensified by occasional reports of his brother's situation in his Paris sickroom-garret; but Henry preferred independence to Vienna oyster suppers, and after his death even his poor widow had spirit enough to decline the propositions of the greasy boodle-bag, who offered her a considerable sum for the purpose of erecting a Christian monument over the poet's last resting-place in the cemetery of Pere la Chaise.

Fit Supporters.

The orthodoxy of the most stupid nations is a mystery that has long puzzled the Christian apologists, and their explanations often recall Diderot's comments upon the prophecy of an ass-bestrident messiah, and its triumphant fulfillment: "A donkey," he says, "carries a ready-made cross on his shoulders, but besides, his intellectual peculiarities may specially qualify him to support the yoke of Christ."

Hades Afloat.

"This town is undergoing a regular witchcraft panic," the French journalist Kellerman writes from Marseilles; "clouds of microbes float almost visibly in the atmosphere, and no man can tell how soon they will choose his body for their tabernacle. They are the only demons we dread nowadays, and what is the worst they appear to be exorcism-proof."

A Holy Hydra.

I do wish they were four
So that I could believe so much the more, says Lord Byron, of the Christian trinity; but the almanac of the Catholic church enumerates 348 saints, and the happiness of the Middle Ages may be inferred from the fact that 106 of them presided over legal holidays, when rustics had to abstain from secular employments and minister to the wants of the sacred tramps who went from house to house with big collection-baskets.

F. L. OSWALD.

PROF. ERNST HAECKEL, the famous German scientist, has again shocked the pious in Germany. On occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Naturalistic Society at Altenburg he delivered a speech which if it had come from the mouth of a man less prominent than he would have been rewarded with not alone common damning, but imprisonment likewise, and perhaps even a command to leave the country where the paper constitution guarantees religious tolerance and liberty of expression.

THE Pharisee who thanked God that he was not like other men ("in those days") certainly had good cause to be proud of himself if it was true, but evidently God was not pleased with him.

Darwin on Religious Problems.

Francis Darwin, the son of the great scientist Charles Darwin, who discovered that cardinal principle of evolution, natural selection, has written a biography of his father. He includes some extracts, not before printed, from his father's autobiography. In some of these, written in 1876, Charles Darwin gives the history of his views on the several topics of Christianity, Theism, the immortality of the soul, etc. The eminent thinker relates:
